MERGER OF PUBLIC UTILITIES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 154) to authorize the merger of street-railway corporations operating in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, and move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Texas, Mr. PATMAN, a member of this committee, wanted to be present if they were going to call up the merger resolution. The gentleman from Texas is opposed to it and the Federated Citizens' Associations here are against the joint resolution. If this joint resolution is going to be called up now we ought to have a quorum to get the membership here, and I shall be compelled to make a point of no quorum to let the Members know the joint resolution is coming up.

I make the point of no quorum, Mr. Speaker.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

FRATERNAL INSURANCE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to call up concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 27), and yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. HARLAN, to offer an amendment thereto.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, on the last day given over to District business, House Joint Resolution 154, providing for a merger of the street-railway systems in the District of Columbia, was the unfinished business. As this joint resolution was the unfinished business when the District Committee last had the call, is it not the unfinished business when the House resumes consideration of District business?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not, because a motion to consider it is necessary. Wherever a motion is required, the unfinished business has no precedence over any other business.

The gentlewoman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a concurrent resolution, which the Clerk will report.

Senate Concurrent Resolution 27

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the action of the Speaker of the House of Representatives and of the Vice President of the United States in signing the enrolled bill (S. 3584) to require all insurance corporations formed under the provisions of Chapter XVIII of the Code of Law of the District of Columbia to maintain their principal offices and places of business within the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, be, and the same is hereby rescinded, and that the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to reenroll the bill with the following amendment in the nature of a correction, viz: On page 1, line 11, of the engrossed House amendment, after the word "corporation," insert the following: "kept in a branch-office agency of such corporation."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the lady from New Jersey is not calling up the merger resolution?

Mr. HARLAN. This is a concurrent resolution to correct a bill that has already passed the House and the Senate.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the expression "to correct a bill" sounds simple, but may be very far reaching in its effect. As I heard the concurrent resolution read, it provides for an amendment with respect to a branch-office agency. How does that change the original bill as it was passed?

Mr. HARLAN. The original bill required all insurance companies incorporated in the District of Columbia to keep their main office in the District of Columbia and to keep their books here for examination, except agency books. When the bill was engrossed, in some way they left out the exception.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. In other words, it does not change the bill as passed, but changes an incorrectly engrossed bill.

Mr. HARLAN. That is the purpose of the concurrent resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Speaker, I offer at this time an amendment to the concurrent resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 1, line 11, after the word "following," strike out the word "amendment" and substitute the word "amendments," and on page 1, line 12, strike out the words "a correction" and insert the word "corrections," and at the end of the resolution strike out the period, insert a semicolon, and add the following:

And on page 1, line 12 of the engrossed House resolution, after the word "agency," insert the following:

"And provided further, That any insurance corporation created by special act of Congress is hereby authorized upon resolution of its board of directors or trustees to reincorporate under the laws of any State of the United States, a certified copy of such resolution of such board of directors or trustees having first been filed in the office of the superintendent of insurance of the District of Columbia and recorded in the office of the recorder of deeds of the District of Columbia. Upon compliance with the above conditions the assets of the said corporation shall thereby become vested in the new corporation. Said new corporation shall faithfully carry out any and every right, obligation, and liability of said original corporation."

Mr. BLANTON. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. Unless it were done last Saturday, until there has been a motion made and passed, or unanimous consent given, vacating the provisions by which this bill was passed and sent to the Senate, can it be taken up now?

The SPEAKER. That was done on Saturday last. This is a concurrent resolution authorizing the engrossing clerk to engross the bill with certain provisions in it.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The amendment was agreed to.

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

MERGER OF STREET-RAILWAY CORPORATIONS

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 154) to authorize the merger of street-railway corporations operating in the District of Columbia and for other purposes.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, pending the motion I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the reading of the preamble, which is all that is left of the joint resolution to be read, the gentleman from Texas be given 10 minutes and I be given 10 minutes to discuss the joint resolution generally.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. THOMASON in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the preamble.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, the preamble being familiar to all the Members of the House and being of some length, I ask unanimous consent that it be considered as read.

Mr. STAFFORD. The preamble being a necessary part of the joint resolution, I shall have to object.

The Clerk read the preamble, as follows:

That pursuant to the act entitled "An act to permit the merger of street-railway corporations operating in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved March 4, 1925, a form of agreement to carry this into effect and providing for the formation of a new corporation to be known as the Capital Transit Co. to acquire properties and/or stocks or securities, and to succeed to the powers and obligations of the Capital Traction Co. and to succeed to the powers and obligations of the Washington Railway & Electric Co. directly connected with or relating to the operation of electric railways, motor busses, and/or other forms of public transportation, having been approved by the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia on the 7th of December, 1931, as follows:

UNIFICATION AGREEMENT

Whereas the act entitled "An act to permit the merger of street-railway corporations operating in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved March 4, 1925, provides "that any or all of the street-railway companies operating in the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized and empowered to merge or consolidate, either by purchase or lease by one company of the properties, and/or stocks or securities of any of the others, or by the formation of a new corporation to acquire the properties and/or stocks or securities and to succeed to the powers and obligations of each or any of said companies under such terms and conditions as may be agreed upon by vote of a majority in amount of the stock of the respective corporation, and as may be approved by the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia: Provided, That no merger of said companies shall be finally consummated until the same is approved by a joint resolution of Congress. Such new corporation shall be incorporated under the provisions of Subchapter IV, Chapter XVIII, of the Code of Law of the District of Columbia, as far as applicable, with issues of stock at a stated par value and/or of no par value, as may be approved by the Public Utilities Commission"; and

Whereas the Washington Railway & Electric Co. (hereinafter referred to as the "Washington Co.") and the Capital Traction Co. (hereinafter referred to as the "Capital Co."), street-railway companies now operating in the District of Columbia, are organized in accordance with special acts of the Congress of the United States for the purpose of carrying on street railway and other business; and

Whereas it is deemed advisable, for the purpose of greater efficiency and economy of management and for the benefit and advantage of the public and of the stockholders of said companies, that their transit properties used in the business of street railway, motor bus, and/or other forms of public transportation within the District of Columbia or between the District of Columbia and adjacent States, and such other property and assets, real and personal, tangible and intangible, as may be described in this agreement shall be placed under unified ownership and operation: and

Whereas the premises, covenants, agreements, grants, terms, and conditions herein have been approved by the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia:

Now, therefore, if and when the said premises, covenants, grants, terms, and conditions herein contained are agreed upon by a vote of a majority in amount of the stock of the respective corporations, their respective properties as hereinafter described shall be transferred to and vested in the new company and the mode of carrying the same into effect shall be as follows:

First. The name of the new company shall be Capital Transit Co. (hereinafter referred to as the "new company").

Second. The new company shall be incorporated under the provisions of Subchapter IV of Chapter XVIII of the Code of Law of the District of Columbia and pursuant to an act of Congress entitled "An act to permit the merger of street-railway corporations operating in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved March 4, 1925, with power to acquire, construct, own, and operate directly or through subsidiaries transit properties within the District of Columbia and in adjacent States, including the power to acquire, own, and operate the properties of whatsoever description to be conveyed to the new company in accordance with this agreement, and to acquire and own the stock and/or bonds of said companies and of any other company or companies engaged in the transportation of passengers in the District of Columbia and adjacent States with the power to mortgage its property, rights, and franchises, and to conduct such other activities as may be useful or necessary in connection with or incident to the foregoing purposes, including the power to buy, sell, hold, own, and convey real estate within and without the District of Columbia. Said new company when incorporated shall become and remain subject in all respects to regulation by the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia or its successors to the extent of the jurisdiction vested in it or them by law over corporations engaged in the transportation of passengers within the District of Columbia. Nothing either hereinbefore or hereinafter in this agreement shall be construed as changing or limiting the provisions of any law with respect to corporations engaged in the transportation of passengers.

Third. The board of directors of the new company shall consist of 15 persons. Of the 15 original directors, 7 shall be nominated by the Washington Co., 7 by the Capital Co., and 1, to hold office for two years, shall be agreed upon by the 14 nominated as above. Of the directors so to be initially nominated by the Capital Co., 5 shall hold office for 3 years and 2 shall hold office for 2 years. Of the directors so to be initially nominated by the Washington Co., 2 shall hold office for 2 years and 5 shall hold office for 1 year.

The directors shall be stockholders and a majority bona fide residents of the District of Columbia, and shall, except as hereinbefore provided, be elected annually by the stockholders at such time and place as shall be determined by the by-laws of the company. The officers of the new company shall be selected by the board of directors.

Fourth. The new company shall have such rules, regulations, and by-laws as the directors shall adopt not contrary to its charter or to the laws in force in the District of Columbia. The duties and powers of the directors and the duties and powers of the officers of the company shall be such as are set forth in the by-laws.

Fifth. The authorized number and par value of the shares of stock of the new company, the number of shares of stock to be issued originally for the purpose of the unification and in payment for the properties of the Capital Co. and the Washington Co. to be acquired hereunder, the bonded indebtedness of the new company, the division of the stock issued by the new company between the Washington Co. and the Capital Co. shall all be as approved by the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia: Provided, That the original bonded indebtedness and stock liability of the new company shall not be in excess of the total amount of the stocks, certificates of stock, bonds, or other evidences of indebtedness then outstanding against the Capital Co. and the Washington Co.

Sixth. After the original issue of stock for the purposes of the unification additional shares of stock and/or additional bonds or other evidences of indebtedness may, subject to the approval of the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia, be issued by the directors from time to time for cash or in payment for bonds, or property, or to reimburse the treasury for capital expenditures.

Seventh. Approval of this agreement by joint resolution or act of Congress of the United States shall constitute and confer jurisdiction on the Public Utilities Commission to issue any order reasonably necessary to secure the operating and/or other economies contemplated by this merger. And said orders shall have the same legal effect and be enforceable in the same manner as other orders of said commission.

Eighth. Upon the organization of the new company the following transactions shall be carried out substantially simultaneously:

A. The Capital Co. shall vest in the new company all of its current assets, all moneys or securities of every form owned by it, whether held as cash, securities, choses in action, or special funds of any nature, all of its estates, lands, rights, powers, privileges, licenses, franchises and properties, real and personal, tangible and intangible, of every kind (including without limiting the generality of the foregoing, 202 shares of the par value of $50 per share of the capital stock of the Washington & Maryland Railroad Co. out of a total of 202 shares issued and oustanding, $66,000 principal amount of 6 per cent bonds of said company, due January 15, 1947, and a demand note for the principal amount of $20,500 bearing interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum made by said company indorsed to the Capital Co.), and shall transfer to the new company all existing operating and other contracts and/or rights (subject to all conditions of said contracts) and shall execute all deeds, assignments, and/or other conveyances requisite for such purpose.

In consideration therefor the new company shall—

(a) Issue to the Capital Co. such shares of its capital stock and/or other securities as may be agreed upon by the Capital & Washington Co. and approved by the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia.

(b) Assume and discharge as the same mature all of the liabilities of the Capital Co., such liabilities to be $5,800,000 principal amount of Capital Traction first mortgage bonds bearing interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum, due June 1, 1947 (in addition to $200,000 principal amount thereof now in the treasury of the Capital Co. which shall be canceled on or before the date of closing hereunder), and current liabilities arising in normal conduct of the business.

It is understood and agreed that to carry out the intent thereof the Capital Co. shall and will as soon as may be possible after the date of closing as hereinafter defined, make distribution to its stockholders, liquidate and dissolve, and that to this end approval of this agreement by joint resolution or act of the Congress of the United States shall constitute and confer all necessary authority to the Capital Co. to liquidate its assets by distributing amongst its stockholders, in proportion to their several holdings of stock in said company, the shares of stock of the new company which it shall have received as the consideration for the sale, transfer, and conveyance of its property to the said new company as provided herein, and thereupon to liquidate its affairs and dissolve its corporate existence: Provided, That the existing liabilities of the said Capital Co. and the rights of its creditors shall not be affected thereby, and that such creditors shall have, as to the new company upon the transfer of property to it as aforesaid, all rights and remedies which they may then have as to the Capital Co.: And provided further, That no action or proceedings to which the Capital Co. is a party shall abate in consequence thereof, but the same may be continued in the name of the party by or against which the same was begun, unless the court in which said action or proceedings are pending shall order the new company to be substituted in its place and stead: And provided further, That the fact of such dissolution in accordance with this provision shall be published once a week for two successive weeks thereafter in at least two daily newspapers of general circulation published in the city of Washington, D. C.

The date of closing is hereby defined as the date of the transfer of the properties mentioned herein to the new company and the delivery of new company shares to the Capital and Washington Cos. in accordance herewith.

B. The Washington Co. will vest or cause to be vested in the new company all of its physical property, real and personal, Glen Echo Amusement Park (except devices now owned by the Washington Co. or Glen Echo Park Co.), tracks, lands, buildings, shops, structures, machinery, rolling stock, busses, easements, franchises, rights, operating and other contracts for the use of tracks, power, exchange of facilities, or otherwise, directly connected with or relating to and used in the ordinary operation and business of an electric railway, motor bus, public transportation company and common carrier, situate in the District of Columbia and State of Maryland (subject to all conditions of said contracts), including without limiting the generality of the foregoing, the physical property, rights, and franchises of the Washington & Rockville Railway Co. of Montgomery County used in the operation of said transit business, with the understanding, however, that nothing herein shall be understood to include the transfer of the right of the Washington Co. and the Washington & Rockville Railway Co. of Montgomery County to exist as corporations or separate corporate entities, nor to include the stock of the Potomac Electric Power Co., the Braddock Light & Power Co. (Inc.), Great Falls Power Co., Potomac Electric Appliance Co., or other investments in stock, bonds, or personal property not connected with or used in the ordinary conduct of the business of said electric railways, nor any cash, bills receivable, credits, or choses in action, except as otherwise herein provided (and that approval of this agreement by joint resolution or act of the Congress of the United States shall constitute and confer the necessary authority to the Washington Co. to retain and hold the aforesaid stocks of the said companies). A general description of the property to be transferred hereunder shall be prepared and delivered to the Capital Co. before the final execution of deeds, and the Washington Co. shall execute all deeds, assignments, and/or other conveyances requisite for such purpose. It being understood, however, that the Washington Co. will transfer to the new company net current assets equal to the net current assets transferred to the new company by the Capital Co., as hereinbefore provided, and no more.

The said property of the Washington Co. shall be vested in the new company, subject in so far but only in so far, as the same may by terms of such mortgages, respectively, attach to any part or parts of said property, to the following mortgages or deeds of trust:

(1) First mortgage of the City and Suburban Railway of Washington, dated September 1, 1898, made to the Baltimore Trust & Guaranty Co., as trustee.

(2) First mortgage of the Anacostia & Potomac River Railroad Co., dated April 1, 1899, made to the Baltimore Trust & Guaranty Co., as trustee.

(3) Consolidated mortgage of the Washington Railway & Electric Co., dated March 1, 1902, made to United States Mortgage & Trust Co., as trustee.

In consideration therefor the new company shall issue to the Washington Co. such shares of its capital stock and/or other securities as may be agreed upon by the Capital and Washington Cos. and approved by the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia, and shall assume such of the above-described bonds as may be approved by the Public Utilities Commission, and in addition shall assume and discharge, as the same mature, liabilities of the Washington Co. incident to the transit business to be transferred as aforesaid.

Out of the total net current assets received by the new company there shall be set aside a reserve in an amount sufficient in the opinion of the Public Utilities Commission to liquidate all claims for injuries and damages against the Washington Co. and the Capital Co. on account of operations prior to the date of closing: Provided, That any excess or deficit in such reserve remaining after the final liquidation of such claims for injuries and damages shall be credited or debited, respectively, to the surplus of the new company.

The new company is authorized to acquire any or all of the outstanding stock of the Washington Rapid Transit Co. (the bus company) on such terms as may be accepted by the owners of said shares of stock and may be approved by the Public Utilities Commission; if and when a majority of the outstanding shares of the said Washington Rapid Transit Co. is acquired by the new company, the Washington Rapid Transit Co. shall be merged or consolidated with the new company when and if the Public Utilities Commission shall so require.

Ninth. The foregoing is based on the present conditions and business of the participating companies and on the assumption that, in the interval before the consummation of the foregoing transactions, there will be no change in the transit businesses, other than as a result of normal operations or necessary to meet changed operating conditions, and that no distribution will be made to the stockholders of Capital Co., except the regular dividend payments, at not exceeding 7 per cent per annum, and that, subject to such exceptions, the assets and liabilities of the participating companies will be substantially as appears from their balance sheets, as of the 31st of December, 1931, subject to variations in the normal course of business.

Tenth. The new company shall take over all existing contracts of the Washington Co. for the sale of power to other railway companies. The Washington Co. will cause the Potomac Electric Power Co., subject to the approval of the Public Utilities Commission, to enter into a power contract with the new company (which may include a lease by the power company of the power properties which the new company will have obtained as being appurtenant to the transit properties to be acquired by the new company), which said power contract shall run for the life of whichever of the franchises of these two companies expires first, and be effective as of the date of closing of said contract. Said power contract shall provide that the Potomac Electric Power Co., or its successors and assigns, will, at all times on request, furnish an adequate supply of electric power for the maintenance and operation of the transit properties of the new company and for power furnished to said other transportation companies. Said power contract shall provide that for a period of 15 years the price to be paid by the new company (1) for 63 per cent of the electric power used for the maintenance and operation of the transit properties of the new company and (2) for electric power furnished to other transportation companies under the existing contracts and/or renewals thereof shall be determined in accordance with the terms and conditions of the present arrangements between the Potomac Electric Power Co. and the Washington Co. for supply of electric power. After the expiration of said period of 15 years the price to be paid for said 63 per cent of the electric power shall be subject to review and determination by the Public Utilities Commission, and shall be made upon the basis herein above provided for the 15-year period, unless and until otherwise ordered by said commission. The price to be paid for 37 per cent of the electric power used for the maintenance and operation of the transit properties of the new company shall be fixed by the Public Utilities Commission and be subject to review and determination annually by that commission.

Eleventh. The Washington Co. shall remain subject to the jurisdiction of the Public Utilities Commission. Any sinking funds now held by it shall remain available for the discharge of securities for which it remains liable and which are secured directly or indirectly by any lien upon property turned over to the new company.

Twelfth. Any and all rights with regard to valuations and/or rate bases now possessed by any of the parties to this agreement shall not be prejudiced hereby, and shall be enjoyed by the new company until a valuation of the properties of the company shall be fixed as now or hereafter provided by law: Provided, That nothing contained herein shall deprive the new company of any rights under the Constitution of the United States.

Thirteenth. The new company shall grant with each street-railway fare a free immediate transfer to any connecting portion of its street-railway lines within the District of Columbia, subject to reasonable rules and regulations to prevent abuse thereof. In addition, transfers between street cars and busses and between bus lines shall be granted under reasonable terms and conditions. The rules, regulations, terms, and conditions upon which all transfers shall be issued shall be subject to the approval of the Public Utilities Commission.

Fourteenth. This agreement is conditioned upon the new company being relieved from the expense of policemen at street railway crossings and intersections, the laying of new pavement, the making of permanent improvements, renewals or repairs to the pavement of streets and public bridges; and the permanent improvements, renewals, or repairs to public bridges over which the street-car lines operate; except that the new company shall bear the entire cost of paving repairs or replacements incident to track repairs, replacements, or changes made at a time when the street or bridge is not being paved, and shall bear one-fourth the cost of other paving, repaving, or maintenance of paving between its tracks and for 2 feet outside of the outer rails, and shall bear the excess cost of construction and maintenance of public bridges, due to the installation or existence of its tracks on such bridges, but nothing herein shall relieve the new company from liability for street paving as owner of real estate apart from rights of way occupied by its tracks, as set out in the so-called Borland law, approved September 1, 1916, as amended to date, and/or in an act to provide for special assessments for the paving of roadways and the laying of curbs and gutters, approved February 20, 1931.

Fifteenth. Legislation obtained to effectuate this agreement shall contain a provision that no competitive transportation line shall be established without the prior issuance of a certificate by the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia to the effect that the competitive line is necessary for the convenience of the public.

Sixteenth. The new company may defray any legal and other expenses of unification which may be necessarily incurred in connection therewith; provided that these expenses shall be treated in the accounts of the new company as ordered by the Public Utilities Commission.

Seventeenth. The new company upon opening its books of account shall set up reserves, special accounts, and deferred charges equal to the combined reserves, depreciation funds, special accounts, and deferred charges of the Capital and Washington Cos. in so far as they relate to depreciation of properties turned over to the new company or to liabilities assumed by it, other than the reserve for injuries and damages as heretofore provided in section 8. Such reserves, or accounts, shall be set up in such manner that there shall be continuity of accounting between the books of the Capital and Washington Cos. and the new company: Provided, That the new company shall not be required to maintain any depreciation fund if it sets up a reserve against depreciation at rates fixed therefor by the Public Utilities Commission, but may use money and/or securities in any depreciation fund turned over to it in any manner approved by the Public Utilities Commission. Nothing herein provided shall be construed as changing or limiting the jurisdiction of said commission over depreciation accounts of any of said companies.

Eighteenth. Approval of this agreement by the Public Utilities Commission or Congress shall not be taken as approval of the considerations mentioned herein for properties or stocks, nor as binding upon the Public Utilities Commission in any future determination of the fair value of the properties used and useful for the public convenience belonging to the Washington Co., the Capital Co., or to be acquired by the new company, that may be made in accordance with this agreement.

The Clerk read the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 3, strike out the word "that" and insert the word "whereas."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, by unanimous consent the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLACK] and I were granted 10 minutes each.

The CHAIRMAN. We are now considering the committee amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. That was the purpose of getting recognition, to have time before the committee amendments were adopted.

Mr. BLACK. My understanding was that the time granted to the gentleman from Texas and myself was after the committee amendments were adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Texas for 10 minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I am just as strongly and heartily in favor of a proper merger of the railway companies in Washington as any person in the District of Columbia. For 15 years I have been working with every energy that was in my being trying to bring that about. Not to bring about a merger that would give something to the railway companies that they ought not to have; not to bring about a merger that would take something away from the people of the District of Columbia, but to bring about a just merger that would give something to the people of the District of Columbia that I think they should now have.

The following appeared in the Washington Star yesterday:

FEDERATION RAPS CAR-MERGER VOTE—OPPOSES COMMITTEE REPORT ON TRANSIT BILL—UPHOLDS CAPPER VIEWS

The Federation of Citizens' Associations at its monthly meeting last night unanimously adopted a report of its committee on public utilities favoring the Capper minority report on the street-car merger bill and opposing the report made to the House by the House District Committee.

When this question came up last District day—April 25—if gentlemen will get the RECORD, they will see that when I raised some objection to the bill the distinguished chairman of the committee, on page 9161, said that the bill was approved by every organization in Washington.

This bill has been in Congress for about 30 years. This is the first year that everybody seems to agree that this is a good bill. * * * As far as I know, everybody in the District, except the gentleman from Texas, agrees that this is a very good bill.

And she said that the people of the District recommended it. I challenged that statement at that time and stated from the floor that, in my judgment, among the 450,000 people who lived in Washington at least 400,000 of them would be against the joint resolution if they understood it was up for passage and if they understood its contents.

What has happened since then? Let me read you a letter that I received this morning. It comes from a pretty authentic source. It is from the Federation of Citizens' Associations of Washington. That is a federation of every association of citizens in this great national city.

The letterhead is "Federation of Citizens Associations of the District of Columbia." The officers are George C. Havenner, president, and all of us know Mr. Havenner and his standing here; George E. Sullivan, vice president, and we all know Mr. Sullivan; A. H. Gregory, treasurer; David Babp, secretary, and H. C. Phillips, corresponding secretary, and we know their standing here. The letter is dated Washington, D. C., May 9, 1932, which is to-day, and it is addressed to myself. It says:

In re: Street railway merger bill (S. J. Res. 13)—

I do not know whether the people of Washington are superstitious or not, but I would not want the number 13 attached to any measure that is going to take $500,000 away from the citizens here every year. The letter says:

MY DEAR SIR: I have been instructed to forward you a copy of the report of the Committee on Public Utilities relating to the above matter, which was adopted by the Federation of Citizens Associations of the District of Columbia at a meeting held May 7, 1932, as follows:

"The Committee on Public Utilities supports and indorses the street railway merger bill, S. J. Res. 13, as reported to the Senate by the Committee on the District of Columbia, with amendments proposed to said bill by Senator CAPPER and Senator BLAINE in a minority report submitted to the Senate on S. J. Res. 13. The committee opposes the bill as reported to the House of Representatives by the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Hoping the above will receive your consideration, I remain,

Very truly yours,

DAVID BABP, Secretary.

I have asked the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLACK] and I have asked the chairman of the committee if they would not put these proposed safeguarding Capper amendments upon this joint resolution which would safeguard the rights of the people. They said no, that they were going to pass it just as it is.

Mr. THATCHER. What, in substance, are the amendments?

Mr. BLANTON. They are too numerous to mention in my few minutes. In nearly every city of the United States where the people's rights are protected, and where the great utility corporations are not in power, the railway companies are required to pave between their tracks. That is just. They are tearing up old construction to clean their tunnels all the time, and if the city had to do it for them, it would be a tremendous expense.

That is a just charge upon the street-railway companies. They, not the people here, ought to pay it.

In their charters, which provide that neither one of these railway companies ever shall charge over a 5-cent fare, although by a favorable and friendly Utilities Commission they are permitted to charge 10 cents, it was provided that they must pave between their tracks. They are getting rid of much of that now by this bill. It is putting a burden that, in my judgment, will amount to $200,000 a year upon the backs of the people of the District of Columbia, and it is relieving these corporations of that just burden. It is not right, it is not just, it is inequitable, and it ought not to be allowed in this House.

Mr. McLEOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. No; I had only 10 minutes. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BLACK] can yield to the gentleman. He is one of the new members on this committee, and comes from the great State of New York and the great city of New York, where lives the North American Co., that practically owns and controls the stocks of both of these companies—a company that came down here and tried to put over that $50,000 razzle-dazzle on Mr. GILBERT and Mr. GIBSON and myself, but did not succeed. I do not blame the gentleman from New York for being heartily in favor of this joint resolution. Constituents of his up there are putting this thing over.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. What else does this do to the citizens of Washington?

Mr. BLANTON. It shifts at least $500,000 per annum from the railways to the backs of the people here. I know if the lady from New Jersey [Mrs. NORTON] understood all that I know about this joint resolution, she would not stand for it for a minute. I ask all United States Senators to read the facts against this joint resolution, which I placed in the RECORD of April 25, 1932, on pages 8885 to 8890.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mrs. NORTON. The lady from New Jersey would say that all the argument she has heard from the gentleman from Texas would indicate that he is the only one who has all of the honesty in connection with this joint resolution.

Mr. BLANTON. All right. Let us see about that. My friend from Texas [Mr. PATMAN], who is a member of the lady's committee, said that he is strongly opposed to this joint resolution. He had to be called away because of some important engagements with constituents this morning and could not be back here until 2 o'clock. I urged the lady from New Jersey to put this joint resolution off until 2 o'clock, so that Mr. PATMAN could come here and be heard and give his reasons for voting against the joint resolution, but she would not do it.

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I can not yield further. The gentleman will have to get his time from the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLACK], the gentleman who represents the city where lives the great North American Co.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. No. I am sorry, my very limited time does not permit it, for I want to put my views before the committee and I have only a few minutes left. I do not know how all of the Democrats feel about Senator CAPPER of Kansas, but I have worked with him. He is a little more, what would you call it—I would call it something that might reflect on LAGUARDIA, of New York, and SCHAFER, of Wisconsin, and since they would rather I would put it "progressive," I will say that he is a little less conservative than I am, but Senator CAPPER is a good man, he is a strong man, and his judgment on this matter is sound.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas will refrain from mentioning Senators by names.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Texas two minutes of my time.

Mr. BLANTON. Thank you very much. Now, I am not talking about anybody whom I ought not talk about. I am talking about a good fellow by the name of CAPPER. He is a good fellow. I have worked with him. He has got some pretty good ideas and some pretty good judgment, and he is going to fix this joint resolution in proper shape when the time comes for taking it up in the Senate. He is going to fix it before it ever reaches the White House, to safeguard the rights of the people. Many of you would not vote for this joint resolution if you did not believe that it would be safeguarded in the Senate. But this joint resolution may pass the House, and a parliamentary situation may arise where CAPPERS and BLAINES could not be present and could not get the proper amendments to the joint resolution. It ought to be taken care of here before it is ever passed in this House. It does not do one thing on God's earth for the people of Washington except give them interchangeable transfer tickets. And it costs them $500,000 additional per year.

Mr. McLEOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I am sorry, but I do not have time to yield.

It does not give the people one other thing of value. It does not promise any reduction of fare. By this joint resolution you are taking off the shoulders of the street railway companies here, in my judgment, $500,000 a year, and putting it on the backs of the people of Washington. Are you willing to do that?

My idea is that this is a half-cooked, half-baked piece of legislation. For the first time since I have been here, the action on the passage of a bill had to be stopped to read a preamble; and we are going to pass the preamble as a part of the joint resolution. In the whole history of Congress I have never heard of that. When, before, have we ever passed the preamble to a resolution? We have always stricken it out.

This is a half-cooked, half-baked, half-understood, dangerous piece of legislation that ought to go back to the committee and rest a while until our friend, Mr. CAPPER, and his helpers can iron out the situation, because he understands it better than any other man in Washington. Are you not willing to do that? Who could be hurt by it? Why not send it back to the committee? I shall make a motion to recommit if somebody else does not do it. I hope that my progressive friend the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA], will do it, but if he does not do it, I will.

Since April 25 I have received almost a goods box full of letters from leading citizens of Washington saying, "For God's sake, do not let that bill pass. We do not want it. We never dreamed there was such a bill before the Congress." I have shifted the responsibility from my shoulders to yours. It is up to you.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I was glad to yield to the gentleman from Texas two minutes of my time, because I did not want to leave him and Senator CAPPER hanging in the air. I did not know how high they would go.

Mr. Chairman, this bill has manifest advantages to the city of Washington. There is a demand for this bill. Every organization in the city has wanted a merger of the street-railway systems, because they understood the absurdity of having a dual railway system, with all of its expense and lack of connection. The Senate went so far as to employ a noted expert, Mr. Maltbie, and this is practically his plan. For years we have been attempting to pass a merger bill through the House. We have gotten as far with this joint resolution as we have ever gotten with any merger bill. This joint resolution will immediately give the people of Washington free transfers from car line to car line, something they have not previously had. It will provide for economies in the operation of the two companies that will permit the two companies to give the people of Washington better service and better equipment. More than that, it will enable these two street-car lines to live; to keep up their employment personnel. There is danger, with this competition and this extravagance from the so-called competition, that very soon one of these lines will have to go out of business, with the eventual failure of pay roll and service. It is in the interest of the unemployed to pass, and pass as quickly as possible.

Mr. McLEOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. McLEOD. I would like to read to the gentleman from New York from the report to accompany Senate Joint Resolution 208, which bill was drafted practically identical with that of Mr. Maltbie's proposition. Mr. Maltbie is the gentleman who has been referred to as one of the greatest transportation experts of the United States. Senator CAPPER in his report said:

> Favorable action on the joint resolution during the present sessio of Congress is important not only to give early effect to the benefits the public will derive from unified operation of the transportation facilities of the District, but because the unification agreement or contract entered into by the companies involved expires by limitation on June 1, 1929.

Further, this great expert, Mr. Maltbie, who has been referred to, referring to a bill that is practically identical, said:

> As a result a joint resolution has been prepared for adoption as indicating the general principle and the specific terms and conditions which should be complied with before the unification of the transportation lines is effective.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, we have reported this bill itself from the District Committee. We have amended the bill in certain particulars. We have acted on the actual legal portions of this joint resolution. We have just now read the preamble. The preamble is the proposed agreement between the companies. It has been approved by the Public Utilities Commission. On that preamble the joint resolution itself hangs. The first section of the bill approves that contract. There is noting now before the committee except the preamble.

As I say, two weeks ago the House gave very serious thought to every portion of the merger proposition.

Every gentleman, including the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN], had an opportunity to come on the floor and offer amendments. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] is a member of the District of Columbia Committee. He had his opportunity there to cure this joint resolution if he did not like it. I did not desire to be discourteous to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN], but I did not think it fair to the House or to the people of Washington to postpone this joint resolution awaiting the convenience of one gentleman. I am sorry I could not do it.

I now yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOLMES].

Mr. HOLMES. Mr. Chairman, I believe we have an unusual situation when it comes to the question of the city of Washington and this particular merger. I have had some experience with public utilities. I have been the mayor of a fairly decent-sized city and know something about conditions surrounding a municipality.

There is no other city in the United States that enjoys as fair light rates as the District of Columbia. People in the District of Columbia are now paying 3.9. There are no industries in Washington. The power company here must depend upon the sale of its power to these public utilities. Once these go out of commission, and there are none other in existence, the Potomac Power Co., I can assure you, will never be able to manufacture power at as fair rates as it is doing to-day. It is able to manufacture its power at such a fair rate because it has this outlet where it can dispose of a great volume of its power.

I realize you can not continue to go along as you have been doing, namely, having two separate companies, because your mode of transportation is entirely different. If one of these organizations fails it, is going to be to the detriment of the riding public of Washington.

I have given this very careful consideration, and I believe it is in the interest of the car riders of the District of Columbia. I believe this merger should be approved by this House and by approving it I think we are taking a step in the right direction. It will make conditions far better for the car riders of Washington and make it far better for the people who are doing business in this community.

Mr. GILBERT. Mr. Chairman, before we proceed further I ask unanimous consent to amend the preamble on page 19, line 15, by striking out the words "one-fourth" and inserting the words "one-half." I do this in order to make the preamble correspond with the amendment adopted by the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the committee amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment, page 1, line 3, before the word "pursuant," insert the word "Whereas."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Page 2, line 4, after the words "operation of," strike out the words "electric railways, motor busses, and/or other forms of public," and insert the words "street railway and bus."

Page 2, line 6, strike out the word "having" and insert the word "has," and in line 8 strike out the words "on the 7th of December, 1931, as follows:"

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the committee amendment. I observe that this amendment is a part of the first paragraph of the preamble, which reads as follows, with the amendment already adopted:

Whereas pursuant to the act entitled "An act to permit the merger of street-railway corporations operating in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved March 4, 1925, a form of agreement to carry this into effect and providing for the formation of a new corporation to be known as the Capital Transit Co., to acquire properties—has been approved by the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia.

I rise to fortify that recital in the preamble by asking members of the committee whether that is a recital of fact, namely, that the agreement recited in this preamble has been actually approved by the Public Utilities Commission.

Mr. BLACK. I will answer the gentleman. The bill came to us in the regular course from the Public Utilities Commission. It was sent to the Speaker and the Speaker sent it to the committee, and General Patrick appeared before the committee in support of the bill.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Ordinarily I would be much impressed by such a resolution as that presented by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], coming from organizations in the District. However, I understand that resolution comes not from these organizations themselves but from some of the delegates of those organizations who take issue with the Public Utilities Commission. So far as the Congress of the United States is concerned, it seems to me that in matters of this kind we must act upon the recommendations of those arms of the Government which have been formed in the District. We have established a Public Utilities Commission in the District of Columbia. It is a servant of the Congress of the United States in the discharge of its duties, and, as a matter of fact, it would be impossible for us, Mr. Chairman, as members of the Committee of the Whole or of the House to go into all of the details and all of the niceties relating to a matter of contract, such as this legislation must be essentially.

We all know that if we could compel the merger of these companies by direct act we probably would insert in the law conditions which are not possible of adoption here. We know that these companies have rights which have been granted them by the Congress in past years by previous legislation, and now that these companies, pursuant to a resolution passed by the Congress itself, have entered into an agreement for a merger, which agreement has been approved by the Public Utilities Commission of the District, our own creature, it seems to me we may rely upon the nature of the agreement thus made, and those of us, who do not have the opportunity, that other Members of the House perhaps have had, to study in detail the matters involved in the proposed legislation, must rely upon the action of the constituted authorities which we ourselves have created for the purpose of securing a merger of these companies which, after all, is exceedingly desirable.

We all know by our own experience that we have these two competing traction lines running side by side and we can not even get a transfer from one of them to the other in obtaining transportation within the District of Columbia.

Street-car transportation is suffering like railroad transportation from competition with bus lines and private automobiles. This condition exists generally throughout the country and quite acutely in the District of Columbia. The present is a good time to adjust transportation facilities in our municipalities. The opportunity for stock jobbing is practically nonexistent. The need for employment through extensions of lines and services is at its height. Any impulse or encouragement that can properly be given to business at this time should be welcome. As I understand it, the pending bill is based not only on legislation already existing but also on contractual obligations and relations heretofore established, and therefore not subject to change by law, unless Congress should attempt to abrogate the terms of contracts now in force. So far as Congress has any power over any portion of the subject matter, that power is retained by the last section of the bill, which reads:

That Congress reserves the power to alter, amend, or repeal this resolution.

The future control of the matter by Congress is, therefore, preserved as fully as it now exists. Of course, any legislation that may be passed must take into consideration existing rights and obligations of the corporations involved. That is done by this bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, answering the remarks of my friend from Illinois, this statement does come from the Federation of Citizens Associations. It recites that they appointed a special utilities committee from the federation to investigate this bill; that the special committee on utilities that they appointed reported back to the federation their opposition to it for various reasons; that there was a meeting of the Federation of Citizens Associations here in Washington on May 7, which was day before yesterday, and they passed their resolution against this bill and asked the House not to pass it. This objection, therefore, comes from the citizens of Washington 100 per cent.

Let me call your attention to another thing. I have taken the floor many times to show that you can not depend on the present Utilities Commission. First, they have tried to run out every independent 20-cent taxi and give the business to this Parmalee Co., that has come in here to run these independent taxis, driven by ex-service men, off the streets of Washington. Twelve hundred of these men fought in France, and are running these taxis to make a living for their wives and children. General Patrick has sought to run them out of business, and he is the man who brought this bill here.

They talk about the Pepco, the Potomac Electric Power Co. Did you know that the bill you are passing provides that for 15 years no power or authority can change an agreement that the Potomac Electric Power Co. has to furnish 60 per cent of the power at a certain price? Why is there such a provision in this bill? It is outrageous. Why should there not be a provision that the amount these companies shall pay the Pepco for power shall be regulated justly and properly in the courts? Why are you taking away the authority of the courts to pass upon and regulate this for 15 years with respect to 60 per cent of the power? It is outrageous. Do you think if you or I were on that Public Utilities Commission we would have sent a bill to Congress with any such outlandish provision in it? Certainly, we would not. It is outrageous.

Now, I have done my duty. I have gone to the trouble of looking these facts up for you. I have gone to the trouble of showing that you can not go on the market to-day and buy $1 of stock in the Washington Electric Railway Co. You can not buy a dollar's worth of stock in Pepco to-day. They will not sell it to you. If they are such poor-paying businesses, why do they not want to sell their stock?

I have called your attention to these things and I have done my duty. It is going to be up to you to vote away the rights of the people of Washington, who through their Federation of Citizens Associations have asked you not to pass this measure. If you do it, the responsibility is on you and not on me. I have done my duty by the people and I have done my duty by the Government.

I work hard and I have tried to bring the facts before you. Now, what are you going to do about it? Are you going to just pass this bill haphazardly? You will not hurt this bill if you delay it. I am for a proper merger just the same as you are, and you will not hurt the measure by sending it back to the committee and letting the Capper amendments be properly prepared and ironed out. This will not hurt anybody, and I guarantee that a proper bill will be ready to be taken up soon, safeguarding in every way the rights of the people, that we can all vote for it, and it will be a measure that will do justice to everybody.

I am going to make a motion to recommit at the proper time. Let us send it back to the committee.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chariman, I move that all debate on this amendment and all amendments to the preamble do now close.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 4, line 1, strike out the words "street railway, motor bus, and/or other forms of public" and insert "street railway and bus."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following amendments:

Page 2, line 8, after the word "Columbia," strike out the words "on the 7th of December, 1931, as follows."

The amendment was agreed to.

Page 5, line 14, after the word "passengers," insert "by street railway or bus."

The amendment was agreed to.

Page 6, line 2, after the word "passengers," insert "by street railway or bus."

The amendment was agreed to.

Page 6, line 20, after the word "and," strike out "a majority" and insert "at least nine of them."

The amendment was agreed to.

Page 20, line 6, strike out the word "transportation" and insert "street railway or bus."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. THOMASON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration House Joint Resolution 154, to authorize the merger of street-railway corporations operating in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the joint resolution as amended do pass.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on all amendments on the bill and amendments to final passage, and the preamble.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en gross.

The amendments were agreed to, and the amendments to the preamble were agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time and was read the third time.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the joint resolution be recommitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the resolution?

Mr. BLANTON. I am.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BLANTON moves to recommit the joint resolution to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were 25 ayes and 62 noes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is no quorum present. The yea-and-nay vote is automatic.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 100, nays 192, not voting 140, as follows:

REDUCTION OF NUMBER OF OFFICERS IN THE ARMY

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a letter addressed to me this morning by General MacArthur, Chief of Staff.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter addressed to me by the Chief of Staff of the United States Army:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF STAFF,
Washington, D. C., May 9, 1932.

Hon. BERTRAND H. SNELL,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SNELL: In the hearings held by the Military Subcommittee on Appropriations on the Army appropriation bill no indication was given to the representatives of the War Department that a reduction of 2,000 officers was contemplated, and in consequence no opportunity has been afforded to express the opinion of the department on such a revolutionary step. As the military adviser of the Government, I am therefore taking the liberty of presenting to you the views of the General Staff on this important matter, with the hope that you will lay them before the House.

Skilled officers, like all other professional men, are products of continuous and laborious study, training, and experience. There is no short cut to the peculiar type of knowledge and ability they must possess. Trained officers constitute the most vitally essential element in modern war, and the only one that under no circumstances can be improvised or extemporized.

An army can live on short rations, it can be insufficiently clothed and housed, it can even be poorly armed and equipped, but in action it is doomed to destruction without the trained and adequate leadership of officers. An efficient and sufficient corps of officers means the difference between victory and defeat.

It is for these reasons and because of the further fact that the success of the American system of preparedness is peculiarly dependent upon the continued existence of an adequate corps of professional officers that the War Department views with the utmost concern the proposal in the Army appropriation bill to reduce permanently by more than 16 per cent the number of Regular Army officers.

Prior to 1920 there existed in the world only two general systems under which military forces were organized and maintained. The basis of one was the conscript; of the other, it was the professionalized soldier. The former afforded the maximum of defense with the minimum of cost, but prescribed as a civic duty service with the colors. The latter depended exclusively upon the enrollment of those who adopted the military as a professional career. It entailed abnormal costs, due to the necessity of reimbursing along professional lines the personnel involved. For this reason no nation has been able in modern times to maintain a professional army of sufficient size to insure complete protection.

In the national defense act of 1920 a new type of military system was devised and established. Through it, for the first time in American history, practical success was attained in adjusting military preparation to our national needs. Every essential provision of that act exemplifies this Nation's purely defensive intent. It conforms to the American tradition of permitting in time of peace only voluntary service in our armed forces and of placing ultimate responsibility for defense upon a citizen soldiery. Finally, it gives assurance of reasonable security at moderate cost.

The principal elements of the American system are two. The first is a small professional force to act as a training cadre—a covering force in case of need, and a framework upon which mobilization of our full force could be effected. The second essential element is a partially developed organization of citizen soldiers divided into a National Guard and various classifications of reserve and other groupments, backed by a continuous program of limited military training for these elements in time of peace.

Our small Regular Army would be impotent, through its own unaided efforts, to defend this Nation against powerful and sustained attack. Likewise an unorganized and untrained population would be tragically helpless in the face of highly organized and trained units. The two parts of the system thus articulate with and complement each other to insure that America's enormous latent strength would not be dissipated through hostile action before it could be harnessed into a powerful military machine.

The Regular Army is the bulwark and basis of the whole structure. It is the instructor, the model, and, in emergency, the leader of the whole. The only continuing body in which reside the professional knowledge and technical skill capable of accumulating, organizing, training, and leading to victory a national army of citizen soldiers is the professional officer corps. Constantly they concern themselves with the mobilization plans for personnel and matériel necessary in a great emergency, and make every practicable prearrangement for the successful operation of these plans should need arise.

Commissioned personnel of the citizen components supplements the corps of regulars, they give generously and patriotically of their time and effort in peace so that, as the numerically preponderant mass of the officers in an emergency army, they may function promptly and effectively. But their devotion and their efforts in this preparation would be wasted without the efficient guidance of their mentor—the regular officer. Through schools, study, research, and practical training the regulars devote their lives to keeping abreast of the times in complicated and rapidly changing arts and sciences, and within the limits imposed by available opportunity impart the results to the officers of the citizen components.

So I repeat that in the last analysis our whole defensive system rests upon the efficient performance of a corps of regular officers sufficient in strength to carry out the vitally essential duties imposed upon it by the act of 1920. In the interests of economy the strength of the professional force was fixed at the minimum considered by Congress in 1920 to be consistent with safety—namely, 18,000 officers and 285,000 enlisted men. During the past decade this strength has been progressively decreased until to-day it stands at approximately 12,000 officers and 125,000 men.

With a vivid realization of the need for rigid economy in public expenditures the War Department budget for 1933 sacrifices everything in excess of bare necessities. The sums requested represent the minimum upon which the Military Establishment may exist for a single year rather than the true requirements of national defense. The department insists that any retrenchment which destroys or seriously damages a vital element of our already weakened defensive structure is not economy but extravagance of the most expensive kind.

The War Department has frequently reported to Congress that the minimum peace strength of the Regular Army at which it can carry out the missions assigned by the national defense act, and make a reasonable preparation for a complete and immediate mobilization for the national defense in the event of national emergency declared by Congress, is 14,063 officers and 165,000 enlisted men. Repeated studies by the War Department confirm the accuracy of these figures. The expedients to which the War Department is necessarily put in order that the missions of the Regular Army assigned by the national defense act may be even approached with the reduced officers and enlisted men appropriated for in recent years can be appreciated only by those who have to carry this grave responsibility.

It appears superfluous to point out again that the United States has achieved a relative degree of land disarmament unique among the great powers of the earth. By no improvisation could our system be adapted suddenly to offensive purposes, because it deliberately contemplates a delay of several months between the declaration of emergency and the time when any considerable force could take the field. Among the armies of the world the American ranks sixteenth in strength, although this Nation ranks fourth in population and first in wealth.

Further reductions would bring us close to prostration—a condition not conducive to the promotion of a feeling of security at home nor to enhancing the respect with which our pacific counsels are received abroad.

Very sincerely,

DOUGLAS MACARTHUR,
General, Chief of Staff.

CONFERRING ON CERTAIN PERSONS PRIVILEGES OF SOLDIERS' HOMES (H. DOC. NO. 315)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read.

To the House of Representatives:

I am returning without approval H. R. 4724, entitled "An act to confer to certain persons who served in the Quartermaster Corps or under the jurisdiction of the Quartermaster General during the war with Spain, the Philippine insurrection, or the China relief expedition the benefits of hospitalization and the privileges of the soldiers' homes."

This bill is identical with H. R. 6997, Seventy-first Congress, third session, from which I withheld approval for the reasons set forth in my message to the House of Representatives, of February 23, 1931, printed as House Document No. 778.. Nothing has transpired since that date which would justify me in now approving this bill.

I can not concur in a proposal to single out one class of civilian employees who served during certain periods of hostilities and confer upon them a right to the benefit of hospitalization and domiciliary care provided by law for veterans of our wars. Such proposal would be establishing a precedent which, in all justice, would call for similar legislation in behalf of other civilians. It would ultimately involve the Government in hundreds of millions of expenditures by the usual accretions of wider spread inclusions of new and borderland groups. I am not unmindful of the value of the service rendered by these civilian components, but I do not feel that they should be made beneficiaries of the laws which have been enacted to care for our veterans—those who served under enlistments, enrollments, or commissions in the Army and Navy. Our first obligation is to these veterans and we should certainly not now reduce the availability of the hospital and home facilities which have been provided for them by throwing such facilities open to civilians.

HERBERT HOOVER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, May 9, 1932.

The SPEAKER. The message from the President will be spread upon the Journal.

Mr. GASQUE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the message be referred to the Committee on Pensions and ordered printed.

The motion was agreed to.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the District Committee for yielding to me at this time. I would not infringe on the committee's time if I had not found it impossible to get time in any other manner. In this connection, I am wondering if there is not something wrong with the system that permits the same Members to come here daily and talk at length on every subject under high Heaven except the pending legislation and at the same time excludes those Members who have intelligent statements to make with reference to the bill. I shall not attempt to make a political speech nor will I open my campaign for reelection to Congress at this time.

I wish to address myself to the War Department appropriations bill that is pending before the House in so far as it pertains to a reduction of officer personnel of the Army. If I did not personally know the gentlemen who wrote this bill, I might be led to believe that it was advocated and sponsored by ignorant individuals who know nothing of the Army and its functions. However, since I do know these estimable gentlemen, I shall attribute their fanciful and unsound views to misinformation that they have gained from some unknown source.

Having had years of experience in the Army, I feel that I am qualified and privileged to speak on this subject with some degree of authority. In addition to discussing the cut in officer personnel of the Army as a whole, I feel it my duty to warn this Congress as to the effects of the provision of the bill that will practically wipe out the Judge Advocate General's Corps, which I had the honor to be a member of for nearly four years.

I was driven from the Army myself in 1922 because of discriminatory legislation that Congress had enacted in reorganizing the Army after the World War. It was then a question of age, as it will be now if the provisions of this bill are made the law of the land.

In 1917, when I volunteered my services, I was 32 years of age, too old to receive a provisional appointment in the Army, the age limit for such appointments being at that time 28. In 1920, when the Army was reorganized, I was 35, too young to hold the rank I had earned, the minimum age limit placed on emergency officers taken into the Regular Establishment with the rank of major having been fixed by Congress at 36.

If I were still in the service at this time, I would be 47 in September, again too old to serve as a captain. I would, if I had not already eliminated myself in 1922, have to be eliminated under the terms of this proposed legislation.

Now, let us approach this matter intelligently and fairly. What will be the results of the decrease to 10,000 in the number of officers of the Army?

The Army appropriation bill proposes to reduce the commissioned strength of the Army to 10,000, made up as follows:

Promotion list officers	8,930
Nonpromotion list officers	1,070
Total authorized strength	10,000

Based on the estimated strength as of July 1, 1932, this will require reductions as follows:

Promotion list officers	1,814
Nonpromotion list officers	356
Total reduction	2,170

The selection of the officers to accomplish this reduction is confined to those most advanced in age in each grade, with a provision that 5 per cent of such older officers in each grade may be retained and younger officers selected in lieu thereof.

Any reduction is inimical to our national defense. Fourteen thousand and sixty-three officers is the minimum required to enable the Regular Army reasonably to carry out its mission prescribed by Congress in the national defense act. Due to appropriation limitations the annual average has been kept down to 12,000, with a consequent shortage of officers with many of the Army's most important functions.

A reduction as now proposed necessarily will result in a drastic curtailment of Army activities in training the civilian components, National Guard, Organized Reserves, and Reserve Officers Training Corps.

Such a reduction will make it impossible to maintain the small, balanced, mobile force so necessary for emergencies.

It will make it impossible to man, even in part, our essential seacoast defenses.

It will not permit the Army to provide anything approaching adequate garrisons for our overseas possessions.

Even with the present strength the shortage of officers with troop units is a matter of grave concern.

The Army school system would be wrecked. The World War demonstrated the necessity of these schools for the training of officers. Just as trained officers are keystones in national defense, the schools are keystones in the officer's training.

The saving reported by the committee, which exceeds the War Department estimate, amounts to less than 3 per cent of the amount expended for pay of the Army. In comparison with the damage to national defense which would result, such a saving is triflingly insignificant. From the standpoint of national defense it is manifestly a penny-wise and pound-foolish proposition.

In normal times such a reduction would be serious enough, but in the present state of world affairs it well might result in a national catastrophe. Literally to hamstring national defense as such a reduction would do is a responsibility thinking men and women will hesitate to assume.

Realizing the extreme danger to our country of effecting an economy by reducing the Army, the chairman of the Appropriations Committee of the House [Mr. BYRNS] on April 5, 1932, at a hearing before the Economy Committee, made the following statement to the Secretary of War, Mr. Hurley:

> It does seem to me that a man like yourself, who is a real business man, as secretary of national defense, could make considerable saving, not by reducing the Army personnel, because I do not want to see that done; not by reducing the Navy, because I have always stood for preparedness; but in the administrative cost.

A drastic contraction of Medical Department activities necessarily would result. Those pertaining to the National Guard, the Organized Reserves, and the Reserve Officers' Training Corps will have to be practically abandoned, and the care of veterans will, of necessity, be greatly curtailed.

Finally, due to the necessary drastic curtailments of many essential activities, the provisions of and the policies laid down by the national defense act would be practically nullified, the morale of the Army personnel would be shattered, and our national defense dealt a staggering blow.

The method proposed for the selection of the officers to accomplish the reduction is even more astounding than the reduction itself. With the 5 per cent leeway, the selection must be based on age alone.

Such a plan is purely arbitrary and has nothing to recommend it.

Relative professional or physical fitness is excluded from consideration.

Individual efficiency as demonstrated by records of service is pushed out of the picture.

A large percentage (many times greater than 5 per cent) of the best-trained, most-efficient officers of the widest experience in the Army would be forced out.

The interests of the Government are in no way conserved by this arbitrary method.

If there must be a reduction, the yardstick of efficiency is the only sound basis for selection.

In the event of any reduction the Government has a right to retain the most efficient officers, and the interests of national defense demand their retention.

Many colonels of the ability, efficiency, and experience for selection as general officers would be ruthlessly plucked on the eve of achieving the culmination of a successful military career.

Likewise, high-ranking officers in the other grades would be forced out just prior to promotion to a grade where they would be among the youngest officers in the grade, while less efficient officers would be retained.

This age-alone method takes no account of the special technical and professional requirements of the different branches of the Army, with the result that certain branches, e. g., the Quartermaster Corps, the finance department, and the Judge Advocate General's department would lose considerably more than 50 per cent of their personnel.

The statement in the committee's report that this reduction would serve to correct unfortunate promotion conditions has no basis in fact, is misleading, and absolutely incorrect except as to the limited acceleration due to the small reduction on May 31, 1933, to make room for the 1933 West Point class.

To the contrary, the removal of the 2,000 older officers would so delay and diminish retirements for age, a potent source of attrition, as to retard materially rather than accelerate promotion.

Entire classes of the Military Academy will be forced out under this method. The great majority of the officers affected are in the prime of their usefulness, far removed from normal retirement.

A striking injustice would be done World War officers who entered the Army in 1920. The national defense act (June 4, 1920), under the provisions of which these officers came into the Army, provided the following minimum-age requirements for appointment in grades, as follows:

	Years
Lieutenant colonel	45
Major	36

Forced by act of Congress to be of such age in 1920 before they could enter the Army, they now of necessity, by the mere passage of time, are among those who would be forced out by act of Congress. It is inconceivable that the Congress will permit such an injustice to be consummated.

Present calculations under this age-alone method show that every officer appointed in 1920 in the grades of colonel, lieutenant colonel, and major of necessity will be included in the group who are forced out.

Contrary to the committee's report, practically none of these officers are receiving the higher pay rates for their grades. Many of them receive as much as $150 per month less than younger officers in the same grade who will be retained.

It is apparent that the age-alone method does not provide the maximum saving.

Among those affected by this age-alone method would be many distinguished officers of both Spanish-American and World War service, including numerous recipients of the medal of honor, distinguished-service cross, distinguished-service medal, and silver-star citation for gallantry in action. The 5 per cent leeway is far from sufficient to take care of them.

The inference in the committee's report that this age-alone method is in accord with the recommendation of the Interdepartmental Pay Personnel Board is decidedly misleading and inaccurate. This board's report in its entirety clearly shows they recommended that any compulsory removals should be made solely upon the basis of efficiency, with a view to retaining those officers who are of greatest value to the service.

Retrenchment that cripples national defense is not economy. Everything in war and for war can be improvised except the trained officer. An efficient and sufficient corps of officers spells the difference between victory and defeat.

Skilled officers, like all other professional men, are the result of continuous and laborious study, training, and experience. There is no short cut to the peculiar type of knowledge they must possess.

To deplete our already inadequate corps of officers would be a most serious blow to our national defense; to accomplish such depletion by forcing out skilled officers due to age alone would be unsound in principle, unfair and unjust both to the officers and to their country—an extravagance rather than an economy.

The provisions on pages 10 to 12 of the War Department appropriation bill for 1933 contemplate a reduction in the commissioned strength of the Army to 10,000.

The bill provides that after September 30, 1932, the funds appropriated for pay of officers shall not be used for the pay of more than 10,000 active officers, and that after the same date the number of promotion-list officers (including general officers of the line and colonels) shall not exceed 8,930. The distribution of these promotion-list officers in grade as proposed by the bill and the reduction made in the authorized strength of each grade are shown below:

Grade	Now authorized	Authorized by bill	Reduction
Major general	21	17	4
Brigadier general	46	37	9
Colonel	470	384	86
Lieutenant colonel	577	473	104
Major	1,725	1,411	314
Captain	3,450	2,822	628
First lieutenant	2,667	3,786	855
Second lieutenant	1,974
Total	10,930	8,930	2,000

This is a reduction of approximately 18.3 per cent in each grade.

The number of promotion-list officers actually removed from the active list under the bill will be less than 2,000 because average commissioned strength is already limited by restrictions in appropriation acts to an average of 12,000 instead of the authorized maximum of 12,402. The number that will be retired is shown below:

Estimated promotion-list strength, July 1, 1932 (including 1932 class from the Military Academy)	10,744
New authorized promotion-list strength	8,930
Number of promotion-list retirements	1,814

The bill stipulates that a sufficient number of non-promotion-list officers be retired to bring the total number of retirements to 2,000. This will require 186 (2,000—1,814) retirements in the non-promotion-list branches.

However, it appears that the provision of the bill limiting total commissioned strength to 10,000 will require still further retirements of non-promotion-list officers. This is shown below:

New authorized commissioned strength	10,000
New authorized promotion-list strength	8,930
New authorized non-promotion-list strength	1,070
Present authorized non-promotion-list strength	1,472
Estimated actual non-promotion-list strength (July 1, 1932)	1,426
Reduction in authorized non-promotion-list strength	402
Number of actual non-promotion-list retirements	356

A further provision stipulates that on or before May 31, 1933, a sufficient number of colonels and lieutenant colonels shall be retired to provide vacancies within the promotion-list strength of 8,930 for the class of 1933 from the Military Academy. This will require additional retirements as shown below:

Estimated strength of Military Academy class of 1933	340
Estimated promotion-list attrition, September, 1932, to May, 1933	140
Additional retirements required on or before May 31, 1933	200

The bill is defective in that it does not fix the new strength of the non-promotion-list branches—that is, the Medical, Dental, Veterinary, and Medical Administrative Corps, and the chaplains. The present maximum commissioned strengths of these branches are definitely specified in existing law.

The bill makes no provision for the advancement of promotion-list officers from second to first lieutenant. The combined strength of these grades is fixed at 3,786, but this number is not subdivided. It is true that the committee report on the measure contains a table showing 2,179 first lieutenants and 1,607 second lieutenants, but nothing in the language of the bill itself states this apportionment or authorizes promotion into the grade of first lieutenant to maintain that grade at any definite strength.

In framing the national defense act it was the intention of Congress to embody in law the following essential elements of national defense:

a. To provide an Army of the United States consisting of three components—the Regular Army, the National Guard, and the Organized Reserves.

b. To organize this Army into the military units necessary to form the basis for a complete and immediate mobilization of the Nation's man power in a national emergency.

c. To make provision for the mobilization of the Nation's material resources and the maintenance of war reserves as an element in mobilization.

To carry out the responsibilities imposed by the act, the Regular Army is called upon to furnish officers for all manner of important duties beyond the limits of the Regular Establishment itself. The number of officers now assigned to duty with the civilian components, about 1,650, is considerably below the number demanded. The proposed reduction in the commissioned personnel of the Regular Army, combined with the relief of all retired officers now on active duty, as is also contemplated by the bill, will necessarily result in a drastic curtailment of the activities of the Army in administering the forces of the National Guard (187,000), the Organized Reserves (108,000), and the Reserve Officers' Training Corps (127,000). The national defense act originally provided for a corps of approximately 18,000 regular officers. Appropriations in recent years have limited this number to an average of 12,000. The War Department has reported to Congress that the minimum number of officers required in the Regular Army to enable it reasonably to carry out its mission is 14,063. This number is required; to enable reasonable provision to be made for the training of the civilian components, to maintain a small, balanced, mobile force for emergencies, to man in part the seacoast defenses of the continental United States, and to allow reasonably adequate garrisons in the overseas possessions.

Even with the force of 12,000 officers now provided, the calls for assignments to duty with the National Guard, the Organized Reserves, and the Reserve Officers' Training Corps can not be met, while the present shortage of officers with troop units of the Regular Army is a matter of grave concern to the War Department. A reduction of 2,000 officers and the relief of the 134 retired officers now on active duty would force the War Department to curtail many essential activities to an extent that would practically nullify the provisions of the national defense act. A cursory survey of the situation indicates that the following reductions in the numbers of promotion-list officers now assigned to highly important duties would be necessary:

Foreign garrisons	336	20
Duty with the National Guard	229	50
Duty with the Organized Reserves	227	50
Duty with the Reserve Officers' Training Corps	308	50
Instructors at service schools	88	30
Students at special service schools, except flying schools	414	50
Students at general service schools	157	50
Instructors at the United States Military Academy	38	20
Officers on recruiting duty	42	50

There are at the present time no more officers assigned to overseas garrisons than are necessary properly to officer the units assigned to those garrisons. A reduction in the number of officers at these strategic outposts would seriously handicap their power of resistance. The importance of maintaining these defenses upon an efficient basis is vital in the present state of world affairs. Their reinforcement in an emergency can not be counted upon. Each of them has its own strategic and tactical mission confined to restricted area. No use could be made of these garrisons in the continental missions assigned to the Army.

The service schools are highly important elements of our military system. The World War demonstrated the necessity of these schools for the training of officers. The small number of regular organizations which provide actual experience with troops makes them of increasing importance. This necessity is augmented by present-day specialization and the rapid development of means and methods of warfare. Just as trained officers are keystones in defense, the schools are keystones in the officers' training.

The proposed reduction in the non-promotion-list branches will necessitate a drastic contraction in the activities of the component corps of the Medical Department and of the Chaplain Corps. Medical Department activities with the National Guard, Organized Reserves, and the Reserve Officers' Training Corps will have to be practically abandoned, and a very considerable reduction will have to be made in the present contribution of the Medical Department toward the care of veterans.

The report of the committee on the bill states that its provisions will not materially lessen the available officer strength in the event of war or national emergency because the officers who are retired will continue to be subject to recall to active service. This statement entirely disregards the fact that the Regular officer in order to be prepared to discharge his duties under the exacting conditions of modern warfare, must be in perpetual state of training and instruction. Officers on the retired list who would be compelled to engage in commercial activities in order to supplement their retired pay and support their families could not be expected to keep themselves abreast of the military profession.

The report of the committee on the measure contains an estimate of $3,814,823 as the annual saving that would result from the retirement of 2,000 officers. This is an average of approximately $1,900 per officer and exceeds the estimates of the War Department. However, accepting the committee's estimate, the saving effected amounts to less than 3 per cent of the amount expended for pay of the Army. Such a saving is entirely insignificant in comparison with the damage which would be done to the national defense and the injurious effect upon morale of the commissioned personnel of the Army if the proposed legislation were adopted.

The bill embodies the astounding proposal that the determination of the officers to be retired in the grades of colonel and below shall be made on age alone, with exceptions in the case of Air Corps officers and second lieutenants. There is also a permissive 5 per cent exemption from this age requirement which the committee report on the bill states is intended to permit the retention of officers who, despite their years, possess special qualifications by reason of which their retirement would be inimical to the best interests of the Army. The bulk of the separations from the active list will, however, occur in a purely arbitrary manner without regard to relative mental or physical fitness or to the individual efficiency as demonstrated by records of service. Surely no organization, civil or military, faced with the necessity for a reduction in personnel, would adopt such a plan for effecting it.

In those portions of the promotion list where officers are arranged in rank in approximate order of age, that is, in the grades of colonel, lieutenant colonel, major, and second lieutenant, the retirement provision would serve to remove the officers at the top of each grade. Thus, for example, a high-ranking major, approaching advancement to lieutenant colonel, where he would be among the younger officers in the grade to which promoted, might be ruthlessly removed from the active list without regard for demonstrated efficiency, while less able officers farther down in the grade and a few years younger would not be even considered for retirement. All of the surviving members of entire classes from the Military Academy and of groups of officers from other sources who entered the Army in a body might be forced into retirement if they happen to be at the top of the grade they occupy.

The additional reduction required to be made on or before May 31, 1933, in the grades of colonel and lieutenant colonel in order to provide vacancies for the Military Academy class of 1933 would be practically concentrated in the colonels' grades. This is because the older officers of these two combined grades would naturally be found in the higher one. Many deserving officers would thus be removed from the active list at a time when they are hoping to be selected for promotion to general officer and thus achieve the culmination of a successful military career.

The proposed legislation takes no account whatever of the special technical requirements of different branches of the Army. Retirements may fall more heavily on one arm or service than on another and the officers removed from the active list in this haphazard manner will leave an unbalanced personnel in the various branches of the Military Establishment. Attention is invited to the table which is appended hereto as Exhibit A and which illustrates this effect. For example, 50 of the 84 permanent officers of the Judge Advocate General's department will be retired while the Quartermaster Corps and Finance Department will lose more than one-half of their present personnel.

The committee report on the bill states that it will have a beneficial effect upon promotion, and will serve to correct the unfortunate conditions now existing on the promotion list due to the presence of the World War "hump" of officers. Consideration of its operation shows definitely that this will not be the case. Since the authorized strength of each grade is reduced by the number of officers who are required to be retired, there will be no acceleration whatever of promotion by the retirements made on or before September 30, 1932. On the contrary, so far as future promotion is concerned, the removal of the older officers from the active list will diminish or entirely discontinue future retirements for age, which are a potent source of the attrition which produces promotion. For this reason, the effect of the bill will be a retardation rather than an acceleration of advancement. It is true that the retirement of approximately 200 colonels and lieutenant colonels in May, 1933, will produce advancement to that extent in the grades below colonel. This effect will, however, not be a continuing one, and once the promotion due to this cause has been made the rate of promotion will again slow down.

The report of the committee on the measure quotes certain passages from the report of the Interdepartmental Pay Personnel Board in justification of the procedure which it proposes. These quotations are lifted from their context in such a way as to be given a wholly improper interpretation. The plan proposed in this bill is not in any respect whatever similar to the promotion plan proposed by the Interdepartmental Pay Personnel Board. That board was formed in compliance with a request made to the President by a joint committee of Congress asking that a system of promotion be devised which would equalize the rate of advancement in the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and the three lesser services, which are also paid under the joint pay act of 1922.

The board was assigned a specific problem which was, in substance, that of accelerating Army promotion within a reasonable period to equality with that of the Navy. To obtain this result necessarily involved certain compulsory removals from the active list of the Army; but these removals, as the report most clearly shows when considered in its entirety, were to be made solely upon the basis of efficiency and with a view to retaining on the active list those officers whose accomplishments indicated that they were of the greatest value to the service. This principle, which was the guilding one in the work of the Interdepartmental Pay-Personnel Board, has been completely and entirely disregarded in drawing the provisions for retirement which are contained in this bill.

I am appending to these remarks, as Exhibits A and B, two tables which show the details of the retirements that would occur as completely as it has been possible to work them out in the time available. Table A gives the retirement of promotion-list officers by branches and indicates the large proportional losses that would be suffered by certain branches, notably the Judge Advocate General's Department, the Quartermaster Corps, and the Finance Department. Exhibit B makes a further analysis of the retirements and shows how they would be distributed by grade and branch.

I sincerely hope the strength of the officer personnel of the Army will not be reduced, and, if perchance it should be the opinion of a majority of the Members of this House to take such action, I again express a hope. That hope is that elimination will not be made on a basis of age only, without due consideration being given to the efficiency of the particular officers affected.

MASONIC MUTUAL RELIEF ASSOCIATION, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill S. 2775, to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Masonic Mutual Relief Association of the District of Columbia," approved March 3, 1869, as amended, and pass the same, and to lay a similar House bill (H. R. 7357) on the table, it having been considered by the committee, and being on the calendar to-day.

The SPEAKER. The gentlewoman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill S. 2775, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the Senate bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, when this bill was called on the calendar a few days ago I objected to it because I thought it might set a bad precedent of giving Federal charters to corporations, but I find that this is a proper amendment to their rights, and I withdraw the objection that I made to it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1 of the act entitled "An act to incorporate the Masonic Mutual Relief Association of the District of Columbia," approved March 3, 1869, as amended, is amended by striking out the word "Association" in the name of the organization and inserting in lieu thereof the words "Insurance Co.," so that the name of the organization shall read "Acacia Mutual Life Insurance Co."

SEC. 2. Sections 2, 3, 4, and 5 of such act, as amended, are amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 2. The company shall have the power to make all and every insurance appertaining to or connected with life or disability risks of whatever kind or nature; and to grant, purchase, or dispose of annuities; to make insurance against injury, disablement, or death resulting from accident and against disablement resulting from sickness and every insurance appertaining thereto; to make and accept reinsurance of any risks; and to furnish any aid or service to promote the health and welfare of its policyholders and their beneficiaries: Provided, however, That the company shall forever be conducted for the mutual benefit of its policyholders and their beneficiaries and not for profit; and, as to its business transacted in the District of Columbia or in any State or other jurisdiction in which it is licensed, shall be subject to all laws of such District, State, or other jurisdiction governing similar mutual insurance companies.

"SEC. 3. The number of directors of said company shall be fixed by the by-laws and shall be at least 21, a number of whom, less than a majority, shall be elected by the policyholders at the annual meeting of the company from among themselves for a term of three years; that in all cases of a tie vote the choice shall be determined by lot, and in all other cases a plurality vote shall decide. The annual meeting of the company shall be held at such time and place as provided in the by-laws. The board of directors shall elect from among the policyholders at their first meeting succeeding the annual meeting of the company a president, one or more vice presidents, a secretary, and a treasurer, and from time to time such additional officers as the by-laws may provide. The president, the vice presidents, the secretary, and the treasurer shall each give bond with surety to the company in such sum as the board of directors may require for the faithful performance of his duties. At all meetings of the board of directors 12 of the board shall form a quorum. In case of any vacancy in the board of directors by death, resignation, or otherwise, such vacancy shall be filled by the remaining directors from among the policyholders of the company to serve for the remainder of the unexpired term.

"SEC. 4. The board of directors shall have full power to make and prescribe such by-laws, rules, and regulations as they shall deem needful and proper for the elections herein provided, and for the disposition and management of the business, funds, property, and effects of the company, not contrary to this charter or to the laws of the United States, and they shall have power to alter or amend the same as the interests of the company, in their opinion, may require.

"SEC. 5. Nothing herein contained shall be construed to affect or impair in any manner whatsoever any vested right or interest existing in or under any contract of the company."

SEC. 3. Such act, as amended, is further amended by adding at the end thereof a section as follows:

"SEC. 6. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved."

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the gentlewoman from New Jersey to explain the purposes of the bill.

Mrs. NORTON. This bill, Mr. Speaker, seeks to amend the charter of the Acacia Mutual Life Insurance Association in order to broaden its service to its policyholders.

Mr. DYER. In other words, that it may take insurance from other people than Masons?

Mrs. NORTON. Yes.

Mr. DYER. And is that the only purpose?

Mrs. NORTON. Yes. It is understood that the business shall be conducted for the benefit of the policyholders and the beneficiaries, and not for profit.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

A similar House bill (H. R. 7357) was laid on the table.

CLOSING WATER STREET BETWEEN TWENTY-SECOND AND TWENTY-THIRD STREETS

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I call up Senate Joint Resolution 50, to authorize the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to close upper Water Street between Twenty-second and Twenty-third Streets, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to consider this joint resolution in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized to close upper Water Street, between Twenty-second and Twenty-third Streets NW., lying north of Potomac Park and south of square 62: Provided, That the consent in writing of the owners of three-fourths of all private property on the south side of square 62 is first had and obtained; and upon the closing of said street between the limits named the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are authorized to transfer the land contained in the bed of said street to the Director of Public Buildings and Public Parks of the National Capital as part of the park system of the District of Columbia: Provided further, That the said commissioners be, and they are hereby, authorized to enter upon said closed area at all times for the purpose of maintenance and repair of all existing sewers and sewer appurtenances.

SEC. 2. The Director of Public Buildings and Public Parks of the National Capital is authorized to transfer to the American Pharmaceutical Association such an area adjacent to the land owned by the said association as shall be agreed upon between the association and the two commissions hereinafter named, so that the location and the setting of the association's building will conform to the plan prepared by the National Capital Park and Planning Commission and approved by the National Commission of Fine Arts for the treatment of that area, and in the construction of said building the said association shall take such steps as are necessary to insure the safety of existing sewers and sewer appurtenances: Provided, That the American Pharmaceutical Association agrees, contemporaneously with the above transfer to it, to transfer to the United States of America title to a strip of land owned by said association 17 feet in depth along Twenty-third Street, for the purpose of widening said street as an approach to the Lincoln Memorial: Provided further, That the design of the said association's building shall be such as to be approved by the National Commission of Fine Arts, and its use shall be limited to organizations and institutions serving American pharmacy on a nonprofit basis.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

CONSTRUCTION, ETC., OF CERTAIN PIPE LINES FOR PETROLEUM

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 7305) to permit construction, maintenance, and use of certain pipe lines for petroleum and petroleum products, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The SPEAKER. The gentlewoman from New Jersey calls up the bill H. R. 7305.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 7305.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 7305, with Mr. THOMASON in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, with the understanding that it be printed in the RECORD as if read, I do not object.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized and empowered to grant permission to the Gulf Refining Co., a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of Texas and registered and doing business in the District of Columbia, to lay down, construct, maintain, and use not more than 10 pipe lines for the carriage of petroleum and petroleum products from a point or points within square 662 in the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, said square being bounded on the north by R Street, on the south by S Street, on the east by Water Street and South Capitol Street, and on the west by Half Street (west), in, and through Water Street, South Capitol Street, in an easterly direction to lot 4 of square south of square 708, which lot is bounded on the north by lands of the Standard Oil Co., on the south by S Street, extended, on the east by Anacostia River, and on the west by South Capitol Street.

SEC. 2. All the construction and use provided for herein shall be in accordance with plans approved by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and under such regulations and rentals as the said commissioners may make and establish in connection herewith.

SEC. 3. No permission granted or enjoyed hereunder shall vest any title or interest in or to the land within the above-mentioned streets, or affect any right, title, or interest of the United States in or to land within square south of square 708.

SEC. 4. The Congress reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act at any time.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this bill is to permit the Gulf Refining Co. to construct and maintain not more than 10 pipe lines for carrying petroleum and petroleum products through Water Street and South Capitol Street, and to permit them to convey those products from vessels to docks on the Anacostia River to a plant which they propose to construct.

There is no opposition at all to the bill, and I understand it will give employment to at least from five hundred to two or three thousand men.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask recognition against the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized.

Mr. BLANTON. I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to put in certain documents and also excerpts to which I shall refer.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I have objected to this bill on several occasions in this Congress and have blocked its passage in the previous Congress.

The Gulf Refining Co. is one of the big international oil combines owned by our former Secretary of the Treasury,

Mr. Mellon, and his interests, which, with the big Dutch Shell Co., has been manufacturing gasoline and crude petroleum in Mexico, South America, and other peon countries and bringing its products in tankers to this country free of any duty, competing with the American independents.

During the last three years they have run out of business the independent oil operators in the United States. They have brought about such a condition that in the districts of my colleagues, Mr. PATMAN and Mr. SANDERS, in east Texas, oil last year sold as low as 2 cents a barrel. Just think of it. Two cents a barrel, when it is estimated by our Government experts that it costs $1.01 a barrel to produce it, considering the overhead and expense of exploitation, and so forth. Bringing in such foreign oil has in the last three years made paupers of millionaire independent operators. In Oklahoma and Texas alone it has put out of employment a hundred thousand heads of families who have been unable to get jobs since then. This Gulf Co., to which this bill grants a free pipe-line franchise through Washington, and which, with the big Dutch Shell Co., has been before Congress for several years with the biggest lobby that money could produce in Washington to defeat any protection that could be put against foreign oil, now comes here and asks this new concession—a pipe line through the Nation's Capital.

It has been estimated that these two big monopolies are able, with their peon labor in Venezuela and South America, to produce gasoline in their Venezuelan refineries and ship it in their tankers and lay it down in New York City and retail it at 4 cents a gallon with a big profit to themselves, yet all this time we are paying 15 and 16 and 17 cents a gallon all through this section, in the Nation's Capital and elsewhere. Now it is sought to give this big monopoly an extra monopolistic right under the very streets of the Nation's Capital, with these pipe lines.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. In just a moment. I will yield when I get through, but first I want to put some facts before you.

The gentleman from Georgia, General PARKER, complained a moment ago and said he was protesting against Members who had important matters to bring before the country not having a right to get up and present their ideas and their facts. General PARKER knows all about military affairs. But I am afraid General PARKER displayed a little ignorance on House procedure. You can always get time in this House and on this floor if you know how. It is all in knowing how.

Mrs. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. In just a moment. I do not want to be discourteous, but I do want to put some facts before the House that must be placed before the country at this time. A Member can always get time to do that if he pursues his rights under the rules. He does not have to ask for two minutes. District day is always a day on which you can get time, if you know how, to say anything you want to about the good of the country and the good of the Nation. That is the reason I am getting time on this day, because I have something to say about the good of the order and the good of the country in connection with my protest against the granting of this extra monopoly under the streets of Washington to the Gulf Refining Co. and Mr. Mellon.

Mr. BOWMAN. Will the gentleman yield for a question there?

Mr. BLANTON. No; I regret that I can not just now. I decline to yield until I get through with my remarks. Then I will yield to any and all Members who wish to ask me questions, because I do not want to take any more time than is necessary to make my remarks. That is the reason I asked permission to put some excerpts and documents in the RECORD without reading them.

It was claimed the other day by the distinguished minority leader and some of the other leaders on his side that the votes which went through the tellers in the House on the economy bill in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union were different from the votes on final roll call. That may be; but did you know that the votes between tellers are secret, confidential, between the Members? Did you know that, with all the power that the press boys exercise in the gallery, to sting us whenever they get ready—sometimes we deserve it and sometimes we do not, but they sting us whenever they want to, personally, individually, and collectively—did you know that, with all that power which they exercise, not one of them will ever give out the name of anybody who passes through tellers, because it is an unwritten rule here, and it has been for years in this House of Representatives and elsewhere that, until Members go down in black and white on a yea-and-nay vote, they can not be recorded individually? That is the reason I say that the important votes of Members of Congress are the yea-and-nay votes. And that is the reason that I have insisted on many yea-and-nay votes. That is the reason given by our "wet" brethern for putting you "on the spot" with the Beck-Linthicum resolution so that there could be a yea-and-nay vote, and the people of the United States could find out how Members here stood on the wet-and-dry question. They recognized that "votes by tellers" could not be made public, and it required a record vote to hold Members responsible for their position on the question.

When you go on record on a yea or nay vote, Mr. Chairman, that is when you are willing to make your stand on public matters a public record before the people.

I want to call your attention to some of those yea-and-nay record votes on the economy bill. Your minority leader, on May 5, 1932, got up on this floor and said, as recorded on page 9675 of the RECORD:

> The majority of the Members on this side of the aisle—

Meaning his Republican side, and meaning his Republican Members, if you please—> have stood for the economy bill, and if it had received the same support on the other side of the aisle there would have been no need of this message.

Was BERT SNELL frank that day when he said this? No.

Was the speech that he made from this floor last Saturday a typical BERT SNELL speech? No. BERT SNELL is a square shooter; he is a hard hitter when he has the facts with him. When BERT SNELL has the facts with him he stands up here, straight up, head up, eyes front, and tells you about it. When he comes in here and hangs over this stand as he did the other day throughout that speech, you can bet your head it is political; he is not speaking the real, but political, facts. It is not a Bert Snell straight-from-the-shoulder speech.

Let me call your attention to some of those record votes. Here is the vote on the consolidation of the Army and Navy. Everybody knows that that will save money.

Mr. BACON. I do not.

Mr. BLANTON. That is because the gentleman has not studied the question as others of us have.

His President, President Harding, studied that question; and a President never suggests anything to Congress unless his Cabinet approves of it. Did you know that? That is what the Cabinet is for, to sit around the table and approve the President's program. Whenever a President comes in and makes a recommendation you can bet your head that his Cabinet has approved of it. Who was his Cabinet? Mr. Secretary Hoover was one member of it. He came in here and recommended to the Congress that it pass a bill consolidating the Navy Department and the Army into one Department of National Defense with one head to it, unifying all the various services and saving the surplus and the overlapping and the duplications. Why, we have four air services. For every enterprise of the Navy you will find a corresponding enterprise of the Army.

If you unify the two services and put them under one head, you can cut off about one-half of the expense of both of them. President Harding recommended that. Thinking men of America have been for it for a long time. It would save at least $100,000,000 annually.

Do you know why Congress has not been able to put this consolidation into effect? The Secretary of War will not let Congress. The Secretary of the Navy will not let Congress.

The big chiefs of staff will not let Congress. The big generals and the big admirals will not let Congress do it. They exercise such tremendous power over the President and over the Cabinet and over Congress, if you please, that they will not let this salutary consolidation to effect economy be brought about in the interests of the people.

In the President's message the other day, if you look at and analyze it, he proposed the consolidation of the munitions bureaus in both the Army and the Navy; he proposed to consolidate hospitals and other things in the Army and Navy. That is all the consolidation bill means, a unification of services. He recommends that after the economy bill has been riddled by Republicans.

Now, as soon as this consolidation was proposed in the bill by our friend, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], than whom there is no one better informed in the House, strong opposition was brought against it by Cabinet officers, generals, and admirals. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] has been here many years; he is a man of high standing and integrity, a man of good judgment, who knows all about appropriations. He knows all about the Army and the Navy. He has been appropriating for both departments for years. He has sat across the table from admirals, generals, and heads of departments, and knows exactly what their needs and necessities are, knows what the needs and necessities of adequate national defense are. He is a patriotic American. Why was not his judgment good?

As soon as he brought the bill to consolidate the Army and Navy Departments into one Department of National Defense before the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments you found the Secretary of War coming before it lobbying, you found the Secretary of the Navy lobbying against it, both trying to kill it. You found the great Navy League of the United States, which, whenever it wants to, spanks your President, and you let them get away with it.

There is nobody here who will say they did not spank your President not long ago and nobody has gotten up here and attacked them for doing it. Who has gotten up here on this floor among your big Republican leaders and defended your President against the great Navy League of America? Not one of you. Why, Carl, if you had done that, those wets in Chicago could not have beaten you to save their lives. People like men who defend their President when a big navy league jumps on him.

The Army and Navy Club here in Washington, than which there is no greater lobby in the world or one with greater influence throughout the United States, began fighting consolidation, and consolidation was finally defeated in that committee.

Then the specially selected Economy Committee took up the question of consolidation, and what happened? You found the great Navy League and the Army Club sending their admirals and their major generals in battle formation against consolidation. The Navy League and the Army and Navy Club had to have some high officer handle that proposal here on the floor of the House. Whom did they pick? They used Army methods and Navy methods to do their picking. They had to recognize seniority; they had to pick between our friend General CHIPERFIELD and General MARTIN.

General MARTIN happened to be a regular. General MARTIN happened to be senior to General CHIPERFIELD; he happened to outrank him; his seat at the social table was a little farther up than that of General CHIPERFIELD, so they picked General MARTIN, our retired general from the United States Army, to lead the Republicans down the line against consolidation. So General MARTIN moved to strike consolidation out of the bill. And he was assisted by General CHIPERFIELD, and General PARKER, and General Goss, and Colonel SNELL, and Colonel TILSON, and Republican cohorts galore, and when consolidation came up on roll-call vote, as shown on pages 9515–9516, we find that 150 Republicans voted under the leadership of that retired general against consolidation, against this economy saving of at least $100,000,000 a year to the people of this country, and they killed it here in the House.

And who led the debate against consolidation? It was none other than your Republican minority leader, Mr. SNELL, of New York, ably assisted by your Republican former minority leader, Mr. TILSON, who is one of your real leaders yet; and of the 150 Republicans voting against consolidation you find Republican leaders like my friend, Doctor CROWTHER, of New York, who is one of your great tariff leaders; our friend from Massachusetts, Mr. TREADWAY; Mr. BACHARACH, one of the big members of your organization; our distinguished jurist friend from Maine, CARROLL BEEDY; BOB SIMMONS, of Nebraska; Mr. MAPES, of Michigan; our friend, CARL CHINDBLOM, of Illinois; Mr. MICHENER, who was your spokesman the other day; Mr. HAWLEY, the former chairman of the Ways and Means Committee; Mr. HAUGEN, the former great chairman of the Agricultural Committee; Mr. REED, of New York; Doctor TEMPLE; our friend CABLE, of Ohio; RAMSEYER; LEHLBACH; LUCE; PARKER, of New York; SHREVE; Doctor SUMMERS, of Washington; and even TINKHAM, our friend TINKHAM, who, by accident, the other day introduced a bill against birth control, and when he found out what he had introduced, how he did get up here and try to withdraw it. He said it got in here by an error on the part of his secretary.

It is quite funny about TINKHAM. I have served with him for about 15 years, and I have never heard him make any speeches except on two subjects the whole time he has been here, his two subjects being, first, condemning Methodists, and, second, condemning southerners for not taking negroes in their primaries and for hanging rapists.

You know, most of his constituents are either Catholics or colored people, and he is forced to do something to be reelected by them. He imagines that his Catholics do not like Bishop Cannon and do not like Dr. Clarence True Wilson, who happen to be Methodists, so every year he makes periodical speeches against Bishop Cannon and Doctor Wilson, catering to that sentiment in his district in Massachusetts. You do not blame him. He has to do that to stay in office. You know also the Catholics do not believe in birth control; neither do the colored people. He thought he would help his political standing in his Massachusetts district by introducing that bill against birth control. He introduced it one day and it was properly referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

When his constituents saw how far-reaching it was, they did not like it. Then he immediately ran in here and tried to withdraw it, but the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] would not let him. I am going to put his exact language and one or two paragraphs from that measure in my remarks. Why, even TINKHAM, the great anti-birth-control Congressman of Massachusetts, was with you against consolidation. So was WASON; my friend UNDERHILL and Governor YATES. General CHIPERFIELD followed his regular leader, our retired major general, and our friend Goss, of Connecticut, did likewise. Down the line some in seniority was your General DE PRIEST, of Illinois. He was following the bunch. Do you know why we will not allow colored people to come into the primaries in Texas? We like them in their places, and they like us. We are the best friends on earth to the colored people. Every colored person in my district would vote for me in the primary if he could do so. But we do not let them vote in our primaries, because they all vote with you Republicans in November. We do not allow them to hamstring us in our primaries in July and then vote with you Republicans in November. Then I find one of your Republican subleaders, Mr. SCHAFER, of Wisconsin, following the bunch against consolidation.

Mr. LINTHICUM. What was this on?

Mr. BLANTON. This was the vote on that Army and Navy consolidation. For fear I might leave out some of the other leaders I am going to put the balance of them in my remarks to show you how many voted against that Army and Navy consolidation.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Does not the gentleman think the Army and Navy could save a lot of money even without consolidation? For instance, take these recruiting offices. Why could they not be consolidated?

Mr. BLANTON. They could save on any proper consolidation. Let me tell you what we have in my home city of bilene. As soon as you get off the train there, you see a great big sign, "Navy recruiting office." Then another sign, "Army recruiting office." Then another sign, "United States Marine Corps recruiting office." Three of them in one city, my home town, with three different agents there spending your money like water. Why do they not have just one? They would have just one with consolidation.

So that hereafter it can not be denied that Republicans did defeat the economy proposal to consolidate the Army and Navy into one unified department of national defense, I want to name in this RECORD the Republicans who voted against consolidation, as shown in roll call No. 66, on pages 9515–9516 of the daily CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for May 3, 1932. Title VI of the Economy Committee's bill, which Title VI was known as "the national defense reorganization act," would have consolidated the War Department and the Navy Department into one department of national defense. The vote came on the amendment by General MARTIN, of Oregon, our retired major general, to "strike out all of Title VI, the national defense reorganization act," and the following Republicans voted with General MARTIN to strike it out, there being 150 such Republicans to wit: Adkins, Aldrich, Allen, Andrews of New York, Arentz, Bacharach, Bacon, Baldrige, Barbour, Beck, Beedy, Bohn, Bolton, Britten, Brumm, Burdick, Butler, Campbell of Pennsylvania, Carter of California, Carter of Wyoming, Cavicchia, Chindblom, Chiperfield, Clague, Clancy, Clarke of New York, Cochran of Pennsylvania, Cole of Iowa, Colton, Connolly, Cooke, Coyle, Crail, Crowther, Caulkin, Curry, Dallinger, Darrow, Davenport, De Priest, Doutrich, Eaton of Colorado, Eaton of New Jersey, Englebright, Erk, Estep, Evans of California, Finley, Fish, Foss, Free, French, Garber, Gibson, Gifford, Golder, Goodwin, Goss, Hadley, Hall of Illinois, Hancock of New York, Hardy, Hartley, Haugen, Hawley, Hess, Holmes, Hooper, Hopkins, Horr, Houston of Delaware, William E. Hull, Jenkins, Johnson of South Dakota, Johnson of Washington, Kahn, Kelly of Pennsylvania, Kinzer, Kopp, Kurtz, Lankford of Virginia, Leavitt, Lehlbach, Loofbourow, Lovette, Luce, McFadden, McLaughlin, McLeod, Maas, Magrady, Manlove, Mapes, Martin of Massachusetts, Michener, Millard, Moore of Ohio, Mouser, Nelson, Niedringhaus, Nolan, Parker of New York, Partridge, Pittenger, H. J. Pratt, Ruth Pratt, Ramseyer, Ransley, Reed of New York, Rich, Rogers of Massachusetts, Sanders of New York, Schafer, Seger, Seiberling, Shott, Shreve, Simmons, Smith of Idaho, Snell, Snow, Stokes, Strong of Pennsylvania, Summers of Washington, Swanson, Swick, Swing, Taber, Temple, Tilson, Timberlake, Tinkham, Treadway, Turpin, Underhill, Wason, Welch of California, Welsh of Pennsylvania, White, Whitley, Wigglesworth, Wolcott, Wolfenden, Wolverton, Woodruff, Wyant, and Yates, aggregating 150 Republicans who voted against consolidation. If any 12 of said 150 Republicans had changed their votes consolidation would have passed.

Let me call your attention to what your Republican subleader, Mr. SCHAFER, who is a member of the Committee on Expenditures, said last Saturday, on page 9769 of the RECORD. He said:

> Within the last three months five members of the President's Cabinet appeared before the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments.

Five members of the Cabinet. Note that. Then he said:

> Before the Economy Committee was created and the members of the Expenditures Committee asked where savings could be made, not one of them could indicate a saving of one-half of 1 per cent of what the administration now claims can be saved, according to press releases.

Is not that a terrible indictment coming from your quasi, semi, sub-Republican leader, SCHAFER, of Wisconsin? Five of them, and they could not tell them one single thing to effect any saving at all by any change of law. Is not that ridiculous? I am going to read you an excerpt from a real Republican and from a real leader and from a real representative of the people, a man who has served as an executive official of this Nation with honor and distinction, a man who knows whereof he speaks, a man who has high intelligence, a man who has good judgment, Mr. BECK, of Pennsylvania, a former Solicitor General of the United States. I want you to remember what he said last Saturday.

Listen! Did you know that the President of the United States has power now to kill any bureau in Washington he wants to and send the employees home? Did you know he has the inherent power right now as Chief Executive of the United States Government to kill any commission he wants to kill and to restrict and limit any department of government with respect to expenditures. Did you know that he can fire any employee of the Government he wants to? Does anybody question this? If so, I yield now to anyone to get up here and say that he questions this statement. Is there a Member here who denies that the President has such power? If so, I want to see who he is. I want to see how ignorant some one may be. [Laughter.]

I will show you that your former great Solicitor General says that the President has such power. Here is what Mr. BECK said on page 9777 of the RECORD of last Saturday.

> There is a second suggestion that I want to make, in which respect I think the Executive has a greater responsibility than we have, and I want to commend this to the attention of the Executive.

He is talking to the President now. The President was talking to us the other day and now BECK is talking to the President. It takes a Solicitor General to talk back to a President, especially a Republican Solicitor General to a Republican President, and he is now talking back to him and makes this further statement. It ought to begin, "Mr. President." He ought to have said, "Mr. President," when he spoke as follows:

> It can not be questioned, since the removal-from-office case of Meyers v. the United States (272 U. S.) which I happened to argue, that the President has the constitutional power to remove, a power which can not be controlled or restricted by Congress in any way.

He says the President has the inherent power to remove which Congress can not stop or restrict, and then he says:

> This high prerogative means that if the President deems it in the public interest that any member of the executive departments should be removed, such is his power. The Supreme Court has so stated. This gave him a power, directly or indirectly, to remove any official in the executive department for whom the public service has no real need.

Then why does he not remove idle employees and abolish useless bureaus?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Andrew Jackson would have had a big time if he had known that.

Mr. BLANTON. I wish to God we had an Andrew Jackson in the White House now. If we had an Andrew Jackson there, he would abolish half of our bureaus and he would make your prohibition violators in Baltimore and Philadelphia and New York hide in the woods. He would send a bunch of marines there and close up every speak-easy you have in your town and the gentleman knows it. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. MILLARD. Was Andrew Jackson a prohibitionist?

Mr. BLANTON. No; but he was a real President, and he knew that the duty was upon his shoulders to see that the laws of the country were obeyed and enforced.

Mr. MILLARD. But he was not a prohibitionist?

Mr. BLANTON. I have heard lots of slurs cast on Congressmen who vote dry, and who, they say, sometimes take a wet drink. I shall repeat what I have said before. I have been here 15 years. I have been pretty active. I have been pretty closely associated with the Members of Congress. I believe I know by name and face and by State the Members so that I can say, "The gentleman from Colorado, Mr. TIMBERLAKE," and so forth, as well as any other Member on this floor. I have been here 15 years and I have never yet seen a Member of Congress take a drink of liquor—not one. I know some of them have done so, because I have been able to smell it once in a while, but I have never seen one take a drink.

I think as a whole my 434 colleagues, taken as a class, are as fine a bunch of loyal, patriotic Americans, who have the best interests of the people at heart, as exists on the face of the earth to-day. Some of them are like LINTHICUM and they want to make a big reputation as a big wet leader and some of them are like BECK and others on that subject, but they are all right even if they do get lots of Members in trouble. They got our friend CARL CHINDBLOM in trouble.

Mr. LINTHICUM. No; we did not do that.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; you did. It is a public calamity for him to leave this House with his valuable experience here as a Member of the Congress. [Applause.] It is a public calamity, and who did it? You wets did it.

Mr. LINTHICUM. No; we did not do it at all; and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM] knows we would not do it. We would not have him go if we could help it. Ask him yourself.

Mr. BLANTON. You caused him to come out for this Beck-Linthicum resolution and caused the drys in Chicago to rise up and defeat him. That is what you did. You caused another good Member to be defeated the other day down in Indiana, as well as causing some others to be defeated. You now have that O'Connor beer resolution (H. R. 10017) up here at the desk, and it has been there waiting for signatures since April 12, 1932, and you have not got it signed up yet, as only 133 Members have dared to sign it, and you will never get it signed up. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM] performed a great service for the country. He is a martyr to the cause. They are noticing what happened to him and they are a little more careful about the kind of Beck-Linthicum documents they sign in the future. [Laughter.] Every pressure known to modern lobbying has been brought to bear on Members, urging them to sign up. The liquor interests besiege Members daily. Even threats have been made. But Members now are more careful about signing such petitions.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield inasmuch as he has referred to me?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; I will yield to my friend.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. While I have been a Member of Congress I have voted for the enforcement of the eighteenth amendment——

Mr. BLANTON. Like a good scout, the gentleman has been brave, and he ought to have continued on the same way. [Laughter.]

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The eighteenth amendment was a part of the Constitution when I came here. I have voted for enforcement, I have voted for laws which seemed sometimes to me quite drastic, for the enforcement of that amendment.

I did not believe when the amendment was put into the Constitution that it was the best method of handling the temperance question, and when the question arose whether I would support a proposition for repeal or resubmission I carried out the same views that I had had all my life and supported the Beck-Linthicum proposal. [Applause.]

Mr. DELANEY arose.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I never put flowers on a grave. I put them where the living are.

Mr. DELANEY. Will the gentleman yield.

Mr. BLANTON. I want all new Members to know our friend from New York [Mr. DELANEY]; he is one of the finest colleagues we have; he is a good scout. He and I differ on the prohibition question, and differ on this, that, and the other; but he is a good scout. Now I yield to him.

Mr. DELANEY. I want to call the gentleman's attention to page 9777 of the RECORD while he is speaking about the power of the President. Mr. BECK referred to President Cleveland in regard to the work he did, and I think it might be very appropriate here.

Mr. BLANTON. I thank the gentleman, and I will put it in my remarks in the RECORD. Here is what Mr. BECK said:

> Let me illustrate by stating that in the administration of that great and wise President, Grover Cleveland, he knew that the departments had thousands of useless employees who were feeding at the public crib and doing little or nothing in return for their salaries, and he instructed his Secretary of the Treasury to make an examination of the Treasury Department. Secretary Carlisle did so, and as a result of a careful canvass he developed that there were some hundreds—I have forgotten how many—who had sinecures. Thereupon, one Monday morning, Secretary Carlisle removed these useless employees. Then Congress was empty for the next two or three days. There were no Members here. They were all hurrying to the Treasury Department, and the pressure of Congress was so great upon the administration that the order was revoked. Thus the wise policy of economy of Grover Cleveland was defeated by Congress. How often that has happened since.

What really happened was this: As soon as Carlisle had abolished the bureau, the Washington papers, that some of you seem to be afraid of, made a fuss about it, and the employees began to come up on the Hill, and then Congressmen made demands, and then Carlisle had to put them all back.

Now, Mr. BECK said on Saturday that we had 800,000 employees on the Government pay roll. Here is what he said:

> If the President would tell each member of his Cabinet to appoint three discreet men to go through each department and ascertain the employees that did not have an honest day's work, it would develop at once why this Government is the most overmanned government in the world, with its 800,000 civilian employees.
> The President, then, by the power of removal could eliminate the dead wood from the department.

The President could remove them if he were not afraid of them. I will vote to send them back home. But how many of you here would vote with me to abolish these useless bureaus?

This Government should take at least 100,000 off the pay roll. Many do not do any work at all. Mr. BECK never said a truer thing in his life when he said there were many Government clerks doing nothing.

If you will appoint a select committee and go with me when they do not anticipate it, I will show you groups standing around doing nothing, and who have not done a good day's work in a month.

Now, many of the Government clerks are fine people. I know a lot of them and they are my friends. They are not to blame; it is their organizations that have forced this on the Government.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Always to a lady.

Mrs. NORTON. Does the gentleman think he is doing an honest day's work to-day?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I left?

The CHAIRMAN. Twenty minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. That is a fair question. Did you know that there is but one way to reach the American people, and that is by what is said here on the floor of the House, which goes into the RECORD?

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. BLANTON. Just a moment. Let me answer the other question first. There is just one way to reach the American people. It is from this floor and through the RECORD. Mr. BYRNS, our great leader, the great chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, spoke for an hour here the other day and made a splendid statement that the country was interested in.

The Washington Star did not mention it; the Washington Times did not mention it; the Washington Post did not mention a thing he said except to barely refer to his speech, saying that he made one attacking the President; the News did not carry his speech. Not a Republican paper in the United tSates carried his speech. Talk about an honest day's work! I worked all day yesterday, even though it was Sunday, and until midnight last night. I am sending this message out to the people of the United States through the RECORD.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. In just a moment. Forty-four thousand copies of this RECORD go out every morning to every part of the United States. I now appeal to the American people to read that record, to take a statement of these facts on the economy bill and look at it and see what it means; and compare it with what their papers in their community had to say about what Mr. BYRNS said and about what Mr. BANKHEAD said, and about what Mr. LOZIER said, and what other leaders on our side said; not a word of which has ever come to them through the Republican press. And I ask them to examine whether or not the papers in their sections are giving them a square deal on the real news from Washington.

If their papers did not carry that speech of Mr. BYRNS, I hope the Democrats in that section of the country will quit buying those Republican papers, and then I shall have done a good day's work. Has the lady another question?

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; certainly.

Mrs. NORTON. Does the gentleman know that this is District day, and that the time of the District Committee on this day is not supposed to be taken up with discussions of every subject outside of the District business?

Mr. BLANTON. I shall answer that. Just the contrary of what the lady says is permitted by the House rules.

Mrs. NORTON. Does the gentleman think it is fair to the Committee on the District of Columbia to waste a whole day like this?

Mr. BLANTON. Just a moment. I think it is both fair and proper. I did not make the rules. Wiser men than I have ever been made the rules of this House. If they had not wanted such speeches on District day, they would have said, as they said in respect to the work on Calendar Wednesday, that nothing but speeches to the bill should be made; but the statesmen of this country who framed the rules of the House of Representatives knew that the day would come when the newspapers would not tell the truth about what happened here, and they knew there must be opportunity in addition to the general debate on supply bills when Members could send messages to the people of the country through the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and if a Member has anything to say and he gets the floor on a day like this he has a right under the rules of the House to speak his sentiments. I have only claimed my rights under the rules of the House of Representatives. Let me call attention to something else.

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Not yet. I am going to refer to all these roll calls on that economy measure and analyze them. I am glad that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER] is here to-day, because I like to have a man present when I am going to refer to him. He said the other day that, with one exception, he went down the line with Mr. MCDUFFIE and his Economy Committee. There was just one exception, he said. He said, excluding the vote on the retired Army generals' amendment to knock out the consolidation of the Army and the Navy, he had voted with Mr. MCDUFFIE. That was the only exception, he claimed, and he asserted that otherwise he went down the line with Mr. MCDUFFIE and his Economy Committee. There is not a man in the House I like better than I do Mr. MICHENER, for he is a fine fellow. I am not reflecting upon him when I comment upon what he said .

Mr. LINTHICUM. I would like him a whole lot better if he would come over to the wet cause.

Mr. BLANTON. You are not going to get him to do that; he has too much sense to do it. Let me show you about his going down the line with Mr. MCDUFFIE. To begin with, on roll call 66, on page 9515 of the RECORD, we find Mr. MICHENER voting "yea" and Mr. MCDUFFIE voting "nay." He did not stay with him that time.

Mr. MICHENER. What is that vote on?

Mr. BLANTON. Consolidation. I will let the gentleman look it up and explain it.

Mr. MICHENER. Oh, to be fair, the gentleman should state what it is on.

Mr. BLANTON. That is consolidation, the one exception he claimed. Now, let us get to another one, on the next roll call, No. 67.

Mr. MICHENER. What was it on?

Mr. BLANTON. That was on the motion to recommit.

Mr. MICHENER. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. That was on the motion of Mr. MCDUFFIE to provide, instead of $2,500 exemption, an exemption of $2,000. That is all there was in it.

Mr. MICHENER. Yes; I voted for the furlough plan, for the $1,000. I did not vote for the high exemption as the gentleman did.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I do not want the gentleman from Michigan to make a speech in my time. I can not yield.

I ask the Chairman of the committee to have the gentleman from Michigan obey the rules. He is on the Committee on the Judiciary, and God knows that if anyone ought to obey the rules it is a Judiciary Committee member. I will let him explain this. The Economy Committee had placed in its bill an exemption of only $1,000, and then had caused a reduction of 11 per cent on all salaries over that, including Congressmen and Senators. Mr. BRITTEN, of Illinois, had passed an amendment to the bill raising the exemption to $2,500, which didn't suit the Economy Committee. Chairman MCDUFFIE therefore moved to recommit the bill, lowering the exemption from the $2,500 to only $2,000, and here is the motion quoted from the RECORD:

Mr. MCDUFFIE offers the following motion to recommit: I move to recommit the bill H. R. 11267 to the Committee on Appropriations with instructions to that committee to report the same back forthwith with the following amendment: Strike out of section 102 (a) of the Economy Committee amendment the following: "Compensation at an annual rate of $1,000 or less shall be exempt from reduction, and compensation at an annual rate in excess of $1,000 shall be reduced by 11 per cent of the amount thereof in excess of $1,000," and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Compensation at an annual rate of $2,000 or more shall be reduced by 10 per cent, but this subsection shall not reduce below $2,000 any rate of compensation of $2,000 or more."

Was not the $2,000 exemption fairer to the people of the country and the taxpayers and the employees than the $2,500 exemption? Yet the gentleman from Michigan voted against this motion to recommit on roll call No. 67.

Mr. MCCORMACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I regret that I can not yield now. My time is short.

Now, the gentleman from Michigan voted against Mr. MCDUFFIE there, and by his vote caused the exemption to be $2,500.

Mr. MICHENER. The gentleman knows that is not fair.

Mr. BLANTON. That is the reason you will find the newspapers all over the country, in all the States over this Nation, saying that Congress refused to decrease their own salaries, because the gentleman left the exemption of all employees, including Congressmen, at $2,500 instead of $2,000, although he did vote for the so-called furlough plan later on.

My resolution, House Joint Resolution 344, is now pending before the committee, wherein I seek to limit congressional salaries to $7,500. And I have been promised a hearing on it again to-morrow. I voted with my friend MCDUFFIE all the way down the line, except that finally I voted for the bill and he voted against it. [Laughter.] There was $48,000,000 left in the bill and I voted for that, because it was the best we could get, but Mr. MCDUFFIE felt bad and did vote against his own bill.

Let me give you another roll call. On roll call 68, page 9518, we find Mr. MICHENER voting "yea" and Mr. MCDUFFIE "nay."

Mr. MICHENER. Will the gentleman not state what that is? What is the use of being unfair?

Mr. BLANTON. That was the vote on the furlough plan.

Now, we find on roll call 69 that MICHENER voted "yea" and MCDUFFIE "nay." That was on the final passage of the bill. I am glad to say I voted with my friend MICHENER on the final passage, because we did save about $48,000,000. We ought to have saved $200,000,000 and would have saved it if Republicans had not murdered McDUFFIE'S economy bill.

Now, I am going to call attention to something that I want to put in the RECORD here in connection with my remarks. I am going to put in a statement by Mr. Malcomb A. McAdoo, of Baltimore, same being an analysis of the expenses of Government for the period 1900 to 1916, inclusive, under Roosevelt, Taft, and Wilson; of the period 1925 to 1928, inclusive, under Coolidge; and of the period 1929 to 1931, inclusive, under Hoover.

It will be noted that the average annual increase in such expenditures under Hoover, over the period 1900 to 1916 under Roosevelt, Taft, and Wilson, amounted to the enormous sum of $3,389,099,000; that the average annual expense under Hoover, 1929 to 1931, inclusive, exceeded by the sum of $457,921,000 annually the average annual expenditures under Coolidge, his predecessor, for the years 1925 to 1928, inclusive. It will also be noted by this statement that the average annual expenditures of appropriations for rivers and harbors and for the Army and the Navy for the years 1929 to 1931 under Hoover amounted to $813,881,226, which is more, by the sum of $182,125,226 annually than the total annual cost of the Government during the period 1900 to 1916, inclusive, under Roosevelt, Taft, and Wilson. This is remarkable when it is remembered that all nations are so impoverished now that war is impossible.

Here is the statement above referred to:

STATEMENT BY MR. MALCOMB R. M'ADOO, OF BALTIMORE

Statement of average ordinary annual expenditures of the Federal Government:

First. For the period 1900 to 1916, inclusive, the period between the Spanish-American War and the World War under Roosevelt, Taft, and Wilson (first term).

Second. For the period 1925 to 1928, inclusive, under Coolidge immediately preceding Hoover's administration.

Third. For the period 1929 to 1931, under Hoover, with an overwhelming Republican majority in the Senate and the House.

For the period 1900 to 1917, inclusive, average annual ordinary expenditures under Roosevelt, Taft, and Wilson's first term	$631,756,000.00
For the period 1925 to 1928, inclusive, under Coolidge	3,562,934,000.00
For the period 1929 to 1931, inclusive, under Hoover	4,020,855,000.00
Average annual increase under Hoover over period 1900 to 1916, under Roosevelt, Taft, and Wilson's first term	3,389,099,000.00
Average annual increase under Hoover over period 1929 to 1931, inclusive, under Coolidge	457,921,000.00
State of same on a per capita basis:
For period 1900 to 1916, inclusive, under Roosevelt, Taft, and Wilson's first term average annual ordinary expenditures per capita, including interest on bonds outstanding	7.08
For period 1925 to 1928, inclusive, under Coolidge	30.25
For period 1929 to 1931, inclusive, under Hoover	32.95
Same per capita statement, exclusive of interest on bonds outstanding:
For period 1900 to 1916, inclusive, under Roosevelt, Taft and Wilson's first term	6.79
For period 1925 to 1928, inclusive, under Coolidge	23.29
For period 1929 to 1931, inclusive, under Hoover	27.89

ARMY AND NAVY

In view of the howl about an inadequate Army and Navy, a statement of the average annual expenses of each for these periods is both interesting and illuminating. It is as follows:

Army

Army, 1900 to 1916, inclusive, under Roosevelt, Taft, and Wilson's first term, average annual expenses, including appropriations for rivers and harbors, but exclusive of expenditures for the Panama Canal and civil expenditures at Washington	$142,582,000
Army, 1925 to 1928, inclusive, under Coolidge, exclusive of annual expenditures for rivers and harbors, but exclusive of civil expenditures at Washington	367,099,424
Army, 1929 to 1931, under Hoover	449,615,164

Navy

Navy, 1900 to 1916, inclusive, under Roosevelt, Taft, and Wilson's first term, average annual expenditures	100,417,000
Navy, 1925 to 1928, inclusive, under Coolidge	327,282,499
Navy, 1929 to 1931, under Hoover	364,266,062

It will be noted by these figures that the average annual expenses for the Army and Navy, 1929 to 1931, under Hoover, exclusive of appropriation for rivers and harbors, amounted to $813,881,226. This exceeded the total average annual expense, 1900 to 1916 ($631,756,000), for all Government departments under Roosevelt, Taft, and Wilson's first term by $182,125,226.

The claim is made that we have an inadequate Army and Navy. If so, what has become of the annual appropriations for each?

The total expenses of every branch of the Government seem to indicate the dire necessity of a revival of Andrew Jackson's slogan, "Turn the rascals out," with an addition to it of "Turn the lights on."

The figures contained herein are compiled from verbatim copies of the records contained on pages 336 and 337 of the World Almanac for 1932.

Mr. BLANTON. Under unanimous consent I will also insert a statement prepared by Mr. Manton M. Wyvell, of the Union Trust Building, Washington, D. C., which shows how certain stocks declined when Congress was not in session. The decline in value is one of the most serious in all history. Here is his statement:

Mr. BLANTON. In that connection I want you to read again what the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] showed you the facts to be on last Saturday. Why did not those facts go to the people of the United States? I want the people of the United States to look in the RECORD for last Saturday, May 7, and read the speech of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA]. They are entitled to it as a news source from the press of the United States.

I am doing a good day's work when I am causing it to go to 44,000 American citizens in every part of the United States in the RECORD to-morrow.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. LINTHICUM. With reference to what the gentleman just said, the people of this country do not seem to realize that Congress has reduced the salaries of Members of Congress $825 each. The papers in my part of the State, at least, seem to think we have not made any reduction.

Mr. BLANTON. Every proposal that has been made here by the Democratic Party has been to reduce the salaries of Members of Congress along with the balance.

Mrs. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mrs. NORTON. The gentleman is always so interested in economy. I wonder if the gentleman realizes exactly how much he is costing the people of the United States to-day.

The RECORD costs $60 a page to print, and the gentleman has already consumed several pages.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, I have served longer in the House than has the lady from New Jersey. The expense of this Congress goes on just the same whether we talk or whether we do not talk. If we had not met at all to-day, the expenses would have gone on just the same.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. Has the gentleman from Texas a right to quarrel with the lady chairman of the committee in public?

Mr. BLANTON. There is better feeling existing between myself and the Democratic chairman of every committee on my side than there is between the gentleman from Michigan and our Democratic chairman. He does not go along with them on important matters and I do go with them whenever they are right. [Laughter.]

I do go with them when they are right. [Laughter.] The lady's salary goes on whether we meet or whether we do not. Every employee of this House who is on a salary basis gets his salary just the same. Had we adjourned at 12 o'clock the expense of to-day would have been just exactly what the expenses will be, anyway, except for a little paper used in printing. In the Printing Office the employees are paid a salary by the year; they have their annual leave, their sick leave, and all the other perquisites which go with their jobs. It does not make any difference; they get their pay whether they print or they do not print.

Our good colleague the lady from New Jersey, as chairman of the District Committee, is peeved just now with me because we would not let her pass a lot of bills in a hurry here to-day. No Member here knows more about the business of the District Committee than I do, for I served as an active member on that committee for 10 years. I honestly believe, that excepting the Committee on Claims, more bad, unwise measures have been favorably reported to the House from the District Committee since it was created than from any other committee of the House during that time. It is my honest belief that it would be a great accomplishment if half of the District measures could be stopped and not passed.

We want to remember that just because a bill is favorably reported from a committee is no reason for us to believe that it is all right and should be passed. Every bad bill that has ever been passed by this Congress since its beginning has been a bill that was favorably reported by some committee. And whenever any Member opposed it the committee naturally did not like it.

I am performing a real service to my country in doing that hard, grinding work that is necessary to get these facts before the people of this country. That is the only way that they will ever force consolidations and abolishment of useless bureaus. It is absolutely necessary that the people should know the facts, and they can get the facts only through the daily CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and the money we spend for it gives the greatest value to the taxpayers.

The people should know this: The President of the United States last December brought us a Budget which was prepared especially under his direction, by his own agents selected by him. He could discharge them at will. They are supposed to obey his order to the letter. They are supposed to do just what he tells them, and nothing more. He could have told his Budget committee before he brought that Budget in here last December: "I do not want you to bring any estimates that aggregate over $2,000,000,000." Is not that so?

Why did he not do that? Why did he not tell his subordinate agents who had to do his will not to bring in here a Budget that aggregated over $2,000,000,000? But he did not. When that question was asked of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL], he said, and I am quoting his exact language: "Why, he then did not know what the revenue would be."

Why, the President showed right on the fly leaf of his budget what the revenue would be. That was one contribution made by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LOZIER] in advance of my speech. The gentleman called your attention to what the President said right on the fly page of the Budget as to what the revenues would be for 1933.

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I am sorry, but I can not. I decline to yield.

Who is responsible for the bringing in of a Budget of nearly $4,000,000,000? Mr. Hoover; nobody but Mr. Hoover. Had he wanted to economize, why did he not do it last December when he brought us a big Budget?

What did your leader, the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL], say about conditions? The gentleman said they were not the same. I said: "There were 7,000,000 heads of families walking the streets last December without jobs," and he said that was not so. Now, I want the people of the United States to pass on whether I am correct or whether your leader, Mr. SNELL, is correct. Is there anybody here who will deny that there were approximately 7,000,000 people without jobs in the United States last December? I want to see who it is who will deny that on the floor.

I yield to you if you will deny it. You know you can not deny it. That is a fact. Then, why did Mr. SNELL deny it? Why was he not frank? Why did he not stand up here like BERT SNELL usually does, 2-fisted, the front of his shoulders straight, and say, "Why, that is true," because it was true?

If the President knew the conditions last December, why did he have his Budget bring in an estimate here for about $4,000,000,000? Then I called his attention to the economies effected by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS].

Mr. BYRNS put in the RECORD bill after bill. He showed what the President estimated he wanted; he then showed what our committee gave and what the savings had amounted to already. He showed that what we had saved already amounted to $161,000,000. Mr. SNELL said they were not the correct savings. Well, now, let me call the country's attention to this. I am putting this in the RECORD for the country. I want this to go to the country. It will not go in any of the newspapers. It does show that we have already saved $161,000,000 and that we have cut that sum below Budget estimates bill by bill. [Applause.]

The Clerk read the bill for amendment.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. THOMASON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 7305) to permit construction, maintenance, and use of certain pipe lines for petroleum and petroleum products, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

REGULATION OF THE SALE OF SECURITIES WITHIN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9065) to supervise and regulate the sale of securities within the District of Columbia. Pending that motion, I ask unanimous consent that general debate on the bill be limited to 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The lady from New Jersey calls up a bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The lady from New Jersey asks unanimous consent that general debate on this bill be limited to 30 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this is a very important bill. It has been considered by the District Committee for many years. I think it contains many features that are detrimental to the welfare of the people of the District. I would like to have some time on the bill.

Mrs. NORTON. I will be glad to yield 15 minutes of my time to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. PATMAN. Fifteen minutes will not be enough time on a bill like this. This is a bill containing 32 pages. It has been before the District Committee for many years. At one time I was on the subcommittee which had the bill under consideration.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, to save time, I object.

The SPEAKER. The lady from New Jersey moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 9065.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9065) with Mr. THOMASON in the Chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOWMAN. Mr. Chairman, the bill under consideration, known as H. R. 9065, is one of the most important bills that has been considered during any session of Congress. It is a bill to regulate the sale of securities, stocks, and bonds in the District of Columbia.

The District of Columbia has just recently passed through an era of fraudulent sales and transactions of worthless securities. Millions and millions of dollars have been invested and lost by innocent purchasers in bonds, stocks, and securities upon representations of unscrupulous and unprincipled brokers and salesmen in the District of Columbia. That condition is evidenced by the long chain of suicides, bankruptcies, and insolvencies that have followed in the wake of these investments. Securities have been pyramided upon worthless properties and have been sold to the public as bona fide and well-secured bonds and stocks, and the people in the District of Columbia have suffered by reason of these fraudulent manipulations and transactions.

That condition has been brought about primarily because there was no law in the District of Columbia to prevent the sale of worthless securities. There was only one remedy in the District of Columbia against fraudulent transactions, and that was the criminal statute which could be applied only after the offense had been committed. There was no law in the District of Columbia to prevent the fraud. There is a law in the Criminal Code which provides for the arrest, prosecution, and conviction of those who would defraud the public; but there is no law in the District of Columbia that permits the detection or prevention of fraud.

Those in the District of Columbia who conceived the idea of defrauding the public by the sale of worthless securities went into nearly every State of the Union and qualified under the blue sky laws of those States. The securities were approved and permission was granted to sell worthless securities and stocks under the apparent protection of the blue sky laws. The citizens of the District of Columbia realized that some protection should be afforded the innocent purchasers and likewise some protection should be afforded the investment houses or the investment bankers who were doing an honest business in the District of Columbia. Consequently, the people of the District of Columbia have almost unanimously presented this bill for your consideration. It is modeled after the protective laws of New York, New Jersey, and Connecticut.

There are two methods of regulating and preventing the sale of worthless securities. One is by licensing the securities themselves. This is known as the blue sky law. The operation of the blue sky law has not prevented the fraudulent sale of worthless securities; in fact, any party who desires to defraud the public conceals the fraud when he goes before the blue sky commission in an effort to have the blue sky commission of any State approve the securties.

This bill does not regulate nor legalize the approval of securities. It offers the second method of regulating the sales of securities by injunction. It provides for the licensing of dealers and sales agents of securities. It requires sales agents and dealers to present to the commissioner of insurance all facts and data concerning the securities which they wish to sell in the District of Columbia. If the salesman or dealer has been convicted in the District of Columbia or in any competent court of the United States, he is denied the privilege of qualifying or registering as a salesman until two years have elapsed since the date of conviction. If the evidence shows, on his application, that a salesman or dealer has been convicted in fraudulent sales of securities or has been enjoined by any court twice, then he is prevented from registering under this proposed act.

These provisions provide an adequate remedy for the people of the District of Columbia. If any citizen in the District of Columbia or anywhere in the United States has any reason to believe that the securities being sold in any jurisdiction of the United States are worthless, then that citizen has the right to call the attention of the commissioner of insurance of the District of Columbia to that particular fact. The insurance commissioner then has this right or power to call in the agent who has been registered as a salesman of securities in the District of Columbia and may then question him, and if he refuses to submit to the commissioner of insurance the facts and data required of him, the commissioner may revoke his license or his registration. Not only this, but if the commissioner of insurance believes at any time, from the evidence submitted to him, that the agent is selling worthless securities or that he is practicing fraud upon the public, he may go into court and have an injunction issued against him and prevent the sale of these worthless securities. Not only this; if conditions justify, he may appoint a receiver for all of the assets of the agent or the copartnership or the corporation that is handling the securities, and thus preserve for the people the tangible property and the assets that can be found.

Recently in the District of Columbia the public heard numerous mutterings and grumblings concerning certain great investment corporations and certain individuals who were engaged in the sale of securities and stocks in the District of Columbia. At that time people were advised that the securities offered for sale by these companies and individuals were worthless, but the hands of the people in the District of Columbia were tied. Nothing could be done until after the offense or the crime had been committed.

Had we had this securities legislation on the statute books of the District of Columbia, it would have been an easy matter for the people of the District of Columbia to have gone to the commissioner of insurance and asked for an investigation of these securities that were being offered on the market. Millions upon millions of dollars could have been saved in the District of Columbia; but there was no law, and it has been proven since that these people actually defrauded the citizens of the District of Columbia, and many of them are suffering to-day the penalty for their acts.

Now, I want this to be borne in mind. The passage of this law does not create a new bureau for the purpose of passing upon securities. Without a single outlay or without a single penny of additional appropriation this bill may be put into force and effect and into complete operation without a moment's delay.

The bill provides that the commissioner of insurance shall handle all these matters, and despite the fact the report shows that the income from the administration of this bill will be something like $50,000, I want to make a correction of that amount, because that is a typographical error. It will bring into the District something like $5,000, which will be amply sufficient to pay for the additional help necessary in the office of the commissioner of insurance.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOWMAN. Yes.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. It is not provided in the measure that the commissioner can act upon his own initiative. He has to wait until some one makes a complaint, does he not?

Mr. BOWMAN. Yes; the commissioner can act upon any information or may make the investigation himself. When a man submits an application to the commissioner for the right to sell stocks and securities he fills out a questionnaire and sets forth his employment during the last five years. If he can qualify under the provisions of this bill, the matter is not discretionary with the commissioner of insurance. He must issue the permit.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Would it not be better if the commissioner could act upon his own initiative and prevent these securities from being sold if he has reason to doubt their value?

Mr. BOWMAN. I will state that he can act on his own initiative. When the application is filed, the agent must submit all data concerning class of securities, stocks, and bonds he desires to sell to the public.

Mr. PATMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOWMAN. I yield.

Mr. PATMAN. I notice on page 10, section 4 of the bill, it says:

Each person registered as a dealer (except a licensed real-estate broker) shall pay to said superintendent for the use of the District of Columbia a fee of $50—

And so forth. Does this bill carry a provision for licensing real-estate brokers?

Mr. BOWMAN. No.

Mr. PATMAN. Then why this particular language?

Mr. BOWMAN. That language is used for the purpose of exempting real-estate brokers from the sale of real estate. Real estate is different from the sale of stocks and bonds.

Mr. PATMAN. Then real estate is not considered in connection with the bill?

Mr. BOWMAN. No.

Mr. ARENTZ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes.

Mr. ARENTZ. The applicant must state what he has been doing for the past five years; and if that is satisfactory, he gets a license, and can start in selling securities of any kind.

Mr. BOWMAN. No; the gentleman misunderstands. When the applicant is licensed, he must also submit to the commissioner of insurance the character and kind of stocks and bonds and securities which he is to sell.

Mr. ARENTZ. But during the year which the license runs when a new stock comes out, he can sell it, or must the insurance commissioner wait until some complaint is made?

Mr. BOWMAN. The commissioner may require him to come again and submit a new proposition of the stock he is to sell.

Mr. ARENTZ. After he has got rid of some of the new stocks or bonds.

Mr. BOWMAN. No.

Mr. ARENTZ. How is the insurance commissioner going to anticipate that the dealer is to sell these new stocks and bonds?

Mr. BOWMAN. There is no law that will prevent fraud.

Mr. TILSON. Would it not be possible to provide that a security salesman should not sell any securities until he had left a description of those securities with the insurance commissioner? Would it not be possible to require him before he could sell at all to leave a description of all securities he intends to sell with the insurance commissioner?

Mr. BOWMAN. The law requires the salesman to submit to the insurance commissioner all of his advertising data concerning the stock he has for sale.

Mr. TILSON. So he could not go to-morrow and take up some new stock that he had never submitted to the commissioner, and sell it?

Mr. BOWMAN. No; it goes along in the regular way—in other words, the matter of the sale of stocks and securities is kept entirely within the jurisdiction of the Superintendent of Insurance in the District of Columbia.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOWMAN. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is one provision in the bill which strikes me askance. That is that you grant to a dealer or salesman the privilege of a license after he has been convicted once. If he has once been convicted of being a crook, why should the man be given another chance to mulct the public?

Mr. BOWMAN. That is along the general line of giving a man another chance. It does arouse the suspicion of the superintendent of insurance and will enable him to keep a better guard over securities than otherwise.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman know of any other law where after a man is proven to be a crook and dupes the public, they give him another chance to do the same thing?

Mr. BOWMAN. We have a lot of crooks who are going back into business.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, yes; but in a case where the public generally is not at stake; but in this instance you allow this man the safeguard of a certificate after he has been convicted, permitting him to go out and again mulct the public.

Mr. BOWMAN. But the gentleman will understand that this certificate is not issued him until two years after he has served his conviction.

Mr. STAFFORD. But the certificate does not bear any stripes upon it to let the public know that he has been once convicted of this particular offense.

Mr. BOWMAN. The superintendent would have ample opportunity to investigate the life and character of the man since he served his sentence.

Mr. STAFFORD. But there are many other avenues whereby he could make a livelihood without giving him another chance to gyp the public in this way.

Mr. ARENTZ. Does not the public have the right to look at the history of each applicant?

Mr. BOWMAN. Yes.

Mr. ARENTZ. If that is true, I think that what the gentleman from Wisconsin says has no bearing.

Mr. BOWMAN. I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to this bill. I am not very familiar with this particular bill and have not had time to give it careful consideration. I rise to make a few suggestions relating to it which I think the membership of the House should consider before passing this class of legislation. In the Seventy-first Congress a similar bill was introduced and I, as one member of the subcommittee which had charge of the legislation, concluded that instead of its being a bill to protect the public, it would come nearer to protecting the people who wanted to defraud the public.

Mr. BOWMAN. The gentleman would not make that statement against the people who appeared in favor of this bill?

Mr. PATMAN. Oh, no; I do not say that in reference to the people who favored it, or anything about those people. I am just telling what my conclusions were after analyzing the other bill, and if I am not mistaken the gentleman from West Virginia himself more or less agreed with me and we killed the bill.

Mr. BOWMAN. But this is the first time this bill has ever been presented.

Mr. PATMAN. Yes; this particular bill, and the only reason I look with suspicion upon this bill is because of the provisions in the other bill which had for its purpose doing the same thing. A good purpose was expressed. It is stated by the gentleman from West Virginia that millions could have been saved the people of the District if they had had some kind of a commission to pass on the securities that were sold to them some two or three years ago in the District of Columbia. I presume he has reference to those securities that were sold which had as collateral certain apartment houses and hotels here in the District of Columbia. It is true that possibly if some one had passed on those securities, some people would have been helped; I do not know, but possibly others would have been harmed. Whenever you grant to a commission or to one person the duty, obligation, and privilege of passing on what people can sell or buy in any locality, you are just as likely to cause a detriment to be imposed on those people as you are to give them a benefit. I say that advisedly. After investigating blue sky laws in many States, I discovered that people who sold fraudulent securities will get into the good graces of the officials. Of course, these officials are not corrupt or dishonest, and they do not mean to do anything wrong, but these people will be able to persuade these officials that certain securities come within the law and should be permitted to be sold in that particular locality.

The commission will put its O. K. on the sale of those securities in that locality. Then these people will advertise to the public that they have the stamp of approval of the commission, that they are bound to have a proposition that is worth while, that is good, and that will protect the investing public, or the commission naturally would never have approved the sale of the securities. I notice in this particular bill a provision that they shall not be allowed to advertise the fact that they have obtained the consent of the superintendent of insurance to sell the securities. If it is such a good proposition and if it is such a safe way of handling securities, why should they not be permitted to advertise it? Of course the inference will be drawn from the fact that they are being sold in the locality that they have received the approval of the District of Columbia officials or they would not be selling them. On page 15, section 5, why did the gentleman from West Virginia deny them the privilege of advertising that they had secured the approval of the District officials?

Mr. BOWMAN. Just for the same reason.

Mr. PATMAN. All right. That answers the question.

Mr. BOWMAN. Let me answer the question.

Mr. PATMAN. The gentleman said, "For the same reason," and, of course, I mentioned the reason a while ago.

Mr. BOWMAN. In the blue sky law States States are permitted to stamp their approval upon these securities.

Mr. PATMAN. Does not the gentleman believe that if this bill becomes law and securities are offered for sale in the District of Columbia, the citizen will have a right to presume they have been O. K'd by the superintendent of insurance in the District?

Mr. BOWMAN. I presume so.

Mr. PATMAN. Why not stamp it on there then?

Mr. BOWMAN. But the citizen of the District of Columbia may appeal to the superintendent of insurance and may make complaint to the superintendent.

Mr. PATMAN. Why make complaint? They have securities that are permitted to be sold. There is no complaint to be made.

Mr. BOWMAN. Oh, the gentleman knows this is to protect the citizen against fraud. We are not protecting citizens against the legitimate man who sells honest stocks and honest securities.

Mr. PATMAN. Why pass this legislation if the intent is not to prevent fraud?

Mr. BOWMAN. I did not say it was not to prevent fraud.

Mr. PATMAN. Well, the gentleman said fraud could not be prevented.

Mr. BOWMAN. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I did not say that at all. There is no statute, there is no law that will prevent fraud. The gentleman understands that. But this is legislation to detect it. It is to give the strong arm of the law to the insurance department so that it can go into court and protect the citizens of the District of Columbia, if there is an attempt to defraud them.

Mr. PATMAN. If the criminal law of the District of Columbia is not sufficient to do that thing to-day, why not amend the criminal law?

Mr. BOWMAN. The criminal law can not protect until a crime has been committed.

Mr. PATMAN. In this case, you will be leaving it to one or two men to say who shall sell securities and who shall not, and what kind of securities shall be sold and what kind of securities shall not be sold. That is a great deal of authority and power to give any one person or any one board in the District of Columbia or elsewhere. May I ask the gentleman to take into consideration the fact that, although the gentleman says this is not setting up a new board or bureau or commission, page 19 of the bill provides as follows:

Assistants to superintendent.

Which is another way of creating another board or commission.

Section 8 reads:

The Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia may appoint and employ such additional assistants—

How many? The number is not stated. Is it a dozen, a hundred, or two hundred? The number is not stated—such number of assistants to the superintendent of insurance for the District of Columbia as may be necessary to carry into effect and enforce the provisions of this act.

If it will take a dozen, that is all right; it is left up to the board. If it will take 200, that is all right; it is left up to the board; or 500.

Mr. HARLAN. Will the gentleman read the next paragraph?

Mr. PATMAN (reading):

Provided that the necessary funds therefor shall be appropriated in any annual or supplemental appropriation act.

Certainly. They will make a contract with these people and then come here and say, "You pay the money." They have always done that, and they will do it in the future.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. They can not make a contract to employ anybody until they actually have the money, can they?

Mr. PATMAN. Certainly they can, if they have the power to do it.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. They may employ somebody, but if they do not have the funds to pay that person, how are they going to employ them?

Mr. PATMAN. It gives them the right to employ these persons.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. But that is subject to an appropriation, is it not?

Mr. PATMAN. Certainly.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Well, there must be an appropriation.

Mr. PATMAN. Then they will come with this pressure before the Committee on Appropriations "You gave them authority to employ such assistants, and they need, in order to carry the act into effect, this many employees. We want you to employ them and pay them. We can not carry the act into effect unless you do." You would be under obligation to carry in an appropriation bill, the necessary funds to pay them.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I live a thousand miles from here, but nevertheless, securities which proved to be absolutely of no value, were sold from Washington in my district, a thousand miles from here.

Mr. PATMAN. And they will continue to be sold after this law is enacted.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. This is the blue sky law, is it not?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes; I presume it is.

Mr. BOWMAN. No; it is not.

Mr. PATMAN. But it is not always the blue sky law that protects the investor. Sometimes it protects the people who are defrauding the investors.

This section 8 reads further:

The said superintendent may specify the authority, duties, and designations of his assistants, and all things done by any of his assistants in carrying into effect provisions of this act shall have the same legal effect as if done by the said superintendent in person.

The said superintendent of insurance, his assistants and clerks, shall not impart any information obtained by them in the course of any examination or investigation, except as may be necessary in the performance of their duties.

Now, although that does not specifically state that a board is created or that a commission is created, yet it gives the board the power to employ any number of assistants it desires to employ and pay them such salaries as they desire to pay them for their services. There is no limit on it.

They will get the money through appropriation bills here in Congress. You gentlemen know the pressure that will be brought to bear in order to get the money appropriated. You have had experiences in cases like this in the past. They will tell you: "Now, you want to eliminate fraud in the District; you have passed a law to eliminate fraud; you have placed the burden upon our shoulders to carry into effect the provisions of the act. In order to do that we have employed certain experts for certain purposes, and have agreed and contracted to pay them certain salaries. Now, then, you give us an appropriation that is sufficient to pay those salaries."

Why, it would be an unanswerable argument. It is always made here. It is made every session; and I do not know whether this will cost $10,000 extra, or $100,000 extra. Possibly in a few years it would cost a million dollars, I do not know, and no one else knows.

There are entirely too many commissions here now, too many officers having too much authority, and the people have been robbed because of the unlimited authority of certain officers of the United States Government.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio for a brief question.

Mr. HARLAN. Does the gentleman believe in the supervision of protection of people in the matter of selling securities?

Mr. PATMAN. I believe in protecting the people by criminal laws, and putting the ones who violate the law into the penitentiaries of this Nation.

Mr. HARLAN. Then, the stand of the gentleman from Texas is that neither licensing the broker nor approving the security is correct; the gentleman does not approve either of those measures?

Mr. PATMAN. I do not know that that is material. I am against unlimited authority to employ assistants. Is the gentleman from Ohio in favor of that?

Mr. HARLAN. I am in favor of protecting the purchasers of securities in the District of Columbia. The gentleman's contention is that there must be an actual crime committed and people actually defrauded before the commissioners can take any step at all; is that right?

Mr. PATMAN. I am willing to amend the criminal laws of the District of Columbia in any way possible in order to convict and send to the penitentiary people who defraud the investing public in the District of Columbia [applause], but I am not in favor of turning over to one man, or any group of men, unlimited power and authority to say who shall sell securities and who shall not sell securities, and state what kind of securities shall be sold, and what kind of securities shall not be sold. That is going too far.

Mr. BOWMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield.

Mr. BOWMAN. The superintendent of insurance does not have the discretionary power to determine who shall sell securities in the District of Columbia.

Mr. PATMAN. But they must be licensed.

Mr. BOWMAN. They must qualify.

Mr. PATMAN. They must be registered.

Mr. HARLAN. He has no discretion with respect to that.

Mr. PALMISANO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. For a short question.

Mr. PALMISANO. May I ask the gentleman from Texas whether or not in Texas there is an insurance commissioner who O. K's the sale or issuance of policies?

Mr. PATMAN. We have a blue sky law that has caused a lot of our people plenty of trouble.

Mr. PALMISANO. Does that apply in Texas?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes; it applied in Texas. In the States that have blue sky laws they go in there, get approval of powers to sell certain securities, and when they get the O. K., they go out and sell the securities and people would buy them, expecting to get good securities when they were not good securities, and the people would buy them because of certain recommendations made by State officials, or because the blue-sky board gave them their approval.

Mr. PALMISANO. Is it not true in all the States——

Mr. PATMAN. I am not entirely familiar with the State laws.

Mr. BOWMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I will be glad to yield.

Mr. BOWMAN. The State of Texas has a blue sky law. In other words, before you can sell stocks or securities in the State of Texas it is necessary for the officials of the State to stamp their approval on those securities, and therein lies the danger of fraud.

Mr. PATMAN. I do not yield any further. The gentleman has had his time, and I want to take my time. You say you must not stamp on any literature, on any advertisement, or make any reference to the fact that this board has approved these securities. Suppose a security salesman offers you a security. You want to purchase that security. There is nothing to indicate that he has a right to sell that security in the District of Columbia. The first inquiry you would make would be, "Have you a license to sell this security?" "Yes; I have a license." All right; you would look at the license, and that would be the same thing as a stamp of approval upon the securities themselves.

AN OFFICIAL WHO IS DRUNK WITH POWER

I want to show you what was done by another officer of the United States Government who was drunk on power. I would call it drunk on power. I had a letter from a banker not many miles from Washington. He says if there was ever a man drunk on power it is Mr. Pole, the Comptroller of the Currency. He says:

This gentleman's ideas would probably work in flourishing times, but not in a depression such as we now have.

I am going to use this case as an illustration of what could happen here. There was passed in this body in February of 1927 what was known as a branch banking law. Of course, there was another provision in that law that did not relate to branch banking at all, but there was very little discussion on the floor of the House as to that feature of the bill. There was much said about branch banking, but very little said about this provision, which gave the Comptroller of the Currency the right to define what constitutes an investment security. The bill went through. If I had been a Member of Congress at that time, I would not have seen any good and valid reason why it should not have gone through. I do not criticize any Member for voting for the bill or any member of the committee for letting it go through. It appeared to be an innocent and harmless provision as an amendment to our present banking laws. It was an amendment providing that section 5136 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, subsection seventh thereof, be further amended by adding at the end of the first paragraph thereof the following:

Provided, That the business of buying and selling investment securities shall hereafter be limited to buying and selling without recourse marketable obligations evidencing indebtedness of any person, copartnership, association, or corporation, in the form of bonds, notes, and/or debentures, commonly known as investment securities—

Listen to this:

As may by regulation be prescribed by the Comptroller of the Currency.

In other words, it was left up to the Comptroller of the Currency to define what constitutes an investment security.

Under this law of 1927 let us see what the comptroller did under similar circumstances, a man who would have no more power than you are giving under the bill before us to-day. Here is what the comptroller did. He defined what constitutes an investment security. Now, listen when I read this definition and see if the definition does not exclude local securities. It encourages banks to squeeze out local borrowers in order that he may have that money and buy investment securities such as are described by the Comptroller of the Currency in his order. Here is what the order contained, and it was issued as of June 30, 1927:

SERIES I. REGULATIONS FURTHER DEFINING THE TERM "INVESTMENT SECURITIES" AS USED IN THE ACT APPROVED FEBRUARY 25, 1927

By virtue of the authority vested in the Comptroller of the Currency by the terms of section 2 (b) of the act approved February 25, 1927, the following regulations further defining the term "investment securities" are prescribed:

1. The business of buying and selling investment securities by national banks is governed by section 5136 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended by an act to further amend the national banking laws and the Federal reserve act, and for other purposes, as approved February 25, 1927, as follows:

"(b) That section 5136 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, subsection 'seventh' thereof, be further amended by adding at the end of the first paragraph thereof the following:

"Provided, That the business of buying and selling investment securities shall hereafter be limited to buying and selling without recourse marketable obligations evidencing indebtedness of any person, copartnership, association, or corporation, in the form of bonds, notes and/or debentures, commonly known as investment securities, under such further definition of the term 'investment securities' as may by regulation be prescribed by the Comptroller of the Currency, and the total amount of such investment securities of any one obligor or maker held by such association shall at no time exceed 25 per cent of the amount of the capital stock of such association actually paid in and unimpaired and 25 per cent of its unimpaired surplus fund, but this limitation as to total amount shall not apply to obligations of the United States, or general obligations of any State or of any political subdivision thereof, or obligations issued under authority of the Federal farm loan act."

2. An obligation of indebtedness which may be bought and sold by national banks, in order to come within the classification of "investment securities" within the meaning of the proviso of section 5136 above quoted, must be a marketable security as designated by the express language of said proviso. Under ordinary circumstances the term "marketable" means that the security in question has such a market as to render sales at intrinsic values readily possible.

3. In classifying a given security as marketable, the Comptroller of the Currency may in specific cases give consideration to various facts and circumstances, but he will require in all cases the following:

(a) That the issue be of a sufficiently large total to make marketability possible.

(b) Such a public distribution of the securities must have been provided for or made in a manner to protect or insure the marketability of the issue.

(c) That the trust agreement under which the security is issued provides for a trustee independent of the obligor and in the case of securities issued under a trust agreement executed and delivered after 60 days from the date of the promulgation of these regulations, such a trustee must be a bank or trust company.

4. This series of regulations may be modified, amended, or withdrawn at any time by the Comptroller of the Currency.

Signed and promulgated this 30th day of June, 1927.

J. W. McINTOSH,
Comptroller of the Currency.

He sent a copy of this order to every national-bank examiner in this country and it was sent to all of the national banks. At that time they were encouraged to build up their secondary reserve. It is a fallacy, but they were encouraged to build up a secondary reserve. A banker would ask a bank examiner, "What can I invest my extra funds in?" "Well," the bank examiner would say, "read the comptroller's order. He tells you what constitutes an investment security." The banker would ask him about a certain security and the bank examiner would say, "Well, I will not tell you about certain things. You just take into consideration the rules laid down by the Comptroller of the Currency." And he has never amended those rules. They are effective to-day. Consequently, when some one would come in and want to borrow some money on local securities, on a local building or a local business institution, he would get out his order and say, "Well, that does not come within the regulations of the Comptroller of the Currency. The order says:

That the issue be of a sufficiently large total to make marketability possible.

Such a public distribution of the securities must have been provided for or made in a manner to protect or insure the marketability of the issue.

In other words, something that is sold all over the Nation by these groups of bankers.

You read their advertisements. Those securities would come within the terms of this order and other securities would not come within the terms of the order. Consequently, these small bankers—and I doubt that they should be criticized or censured for it because they were acting in compliance with orders issued from Washington—invested their funds in these securities that were recommended to them by the agents of the international banks who would follow in the footsteps of the bank examiner. When the bank examiner would leave, the agent would come in and say, "Let me sell you some securities to build up a secondary reserve." The banker would say, "Do your securities come within the terms of this order," and they would reply, "Certainly; here is the order and here are the securities. You see, they are handled by a number of banks, the Chase National and all these other large banks of the Nation are selling them, and that causes them to come within this order with respect to wide distribution. They are posted on the exchanges every day and you can tell what they are worth. You take John Jones's paper, although it is good, you can not get up in the morning and look in any daily paper and tell how much that paper is worth because it is not listed. With this paper you can do that. So the idea is to squeeze out John Jones and invest in some of these marketable securities as defined by the regulations of the Comptroller of the Currency."

LOCAL PEOPLE SUFFERED

What happened? They squeezed out local people and that money went to New York. Lots of it went into foreign bonds sold to these bankers for 100 cents on the dollar, and these agents of the international bankers would tell these other bankers, and one of them told me so: "These securities are so good that not only should you invest all your idle funds in such securities, but your directors should get together and put all the money they can get into them. Not many more are going to be offered. Here are good Colombian bonds drawing 6 per cent."

They took the advice of the representatives of the international banks about these bonds, and now some of them are selling for 7 cents on the dollar and they are some of the marketable securities that the Comptroller of the Currency had so much to say about.

I do not know but what this had a great deal to do with the crash in 1929. Here was the Comptroller of the Currency stimulating speculation. He was encouraging the issuance of these foreign bonds and other securities that would come within his definition. He was encouraging the withdrawal of money from the local banks of the Nation and putting that money into a few banks in New York. Do you not think that contributed to the collapse in 1929? Remember that what I am telling you now was just started in September, 1927.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman will remember that the F. H. Smith Co., of which Mr. Fred Zihlman, who used to be a member of the District Committee and the chairman of it, was a former director and a high officer, pyramided its securities on property and sold them all over the country when they were not worth 2 cents on the dollar, and this bankrupted a great many people here.

Mr. PATMAN. That is very true. I do not know about the value of the stocks or the securities that were offered, but I know a great many people were defrauded by reason of the sale of those securities; and what evidence have we before us that this board would not have approved the sale of those securities under the circumstances under which they were offered?

Mr. BLANTON. It was one of the leading firms in this city, with a Member of Congress and a chairman of one of the important committees holding high office in the company. Of course, they could have received such approval under a bill such as this.

Mr. PATMAN. In 1927, if they had got such approval, they would have then gone to the people with the O. K. of an investigating body, and they would have said: "Very seldom do you have the opportunity of purchasing securities that have been investigated by some disinterested party or parties; an investigation paid for by public funds, but in this case your public officials have investigated these securities and have found them to be sound and have recommended to the investing public of the District of Columbia that they purchase them, and now we offer them for sale."

Mr. BOWMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes.

Mr. BOWMAN. Did these international bonds or securities come within the jurisdiction of the blue sky laws?

Mr. PATMAN. Oh, the way they were sold they would not have to go before any local board. They would deliver them by mail and they would not be caught under this proposed act.

Mr. BLANTON. With respect to securities they sell out of the District of Columbia, under this bill they do not even have to have them registered or passed upon. All they have to do is to get a license and then they sell them indiscriminately and promiscuously everywhere.

Mr. PATMAN. I want to tell you something more about this order of the Comptroller of the Currency.

In 1927, when the comptroller issued the investment order, railroad bonds immediately commenced a downward trend. Interest rates were too low. So did 28 textiles and 8 stocks of sugar producing and refining companies; fertilizer, four of the big stocks, up slightly, but very small, and then downward. Here is an index of 90 stocks that went upward immediately after July, 1929.

Bank stock went up immediately. Crude-petroleum prices went downward. So with gasoline prices. Cotton prices went down and cotton goods.

Why, there was every incentive to invest your money in some of these securities that the Comptroller of the Currency said were good securities, and they were drawing 6 and 8 per cent interest annually. Why should they invest their money with local people on unlisted securities and get a low interest rate, or invest it in local enterprises where the dividends were not so large as dividends from the securities that came within the Comptroller of the Currency's order?

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. Does the gentleman know whether the comptroller's provisions came within the terms of any specific foreign security?

Mr. PATMAN. No.

Mr. BLACK. The gentleman takes the position that if these foreign securities had not been bought, and that that large amount of money was still in this country, we would not have had the depression?

Mr. PATMAN. Probably the depression would never have come. The incentive was to take the money out of the local banks, send it to New York, invest it in these securities, which the Comptroller of the Currency stated were good securities, as he recommended under the order of regulation issued June 27.

To my mind that order did more to cause this depression, to cause this collapse, to cause the distress and suffering that we have to-day than any other one contributing factor.

Mr. BLACK. The gentleman says that in connection with our helping the Federal reserve banks in the gold situation?

Mr. PATMAN. This was in 1927. Let me tell you something about these Colombian bonds. Certain people in the United States purchased an invalid concession—not a valid concession, but an invalid concession. It was canceled. They knew it had been canceled when they purchased it. It was purchased by Mellon and Morgan.

When they made that purchase, they had just as well have said, "We can make them validate this concession. We will take it, although it has been canceled. We will get it validated."

They took the invalidated concession, said to be worth $2,000,000,000—and what did they do? That South American Republic, Colombia, ratified it and validated it before they could get loans through the Wall Street banks. That is what they did. Part of the money loaned to that country was withheld until the concession was ratified by the Colombian Congress.

To-day they hold that concession, estimated to be worth $2,000,000,000, by reason of the pressure brought to bear on the Colombian Government.

I remember reading an article headed "My Brother and I." I do not remember who wrote the article, but anyone can find out. It said in this article that Mellon and his brother have been said to control $8,000,000,000 worth of property, but it is only $7,950,000,000 worth of this world's goods.

It lacks $50,000,000 of being $8,000,000,000 worth of wealth. I do not know how much he was worth when he finally consented to become Secretary of the Treasury, but it was estimated that he and his brother were worth around $500,000,000. As to where the difference came in between $500,000,000 and $8,000,000,000 from March 4, 1921, to the time he was pardoned by President Hoover in 1932, I do not know, but that doubtless concessions, amounting to $2,000,000,000 from one country at one time, would add greatly to that enhanced wealth.

MELLON AND MILLS DISQUALIFIED

Men like Andrew W. Mellon or Mr. Ogden Livingston Mills should not be permitted to hold the office of Secretary of the Treasury. Their policies and interests disqualify them. And, too, they are men who inherited their wealth from fathers and grandfathers. They have never wanted for anything in their lives. Not only are they assured of everything they desire during their lifetime, but they have sufficient property to enable their descendants for the next 5 or 10 generations to live in luxury without the turning of a hand. They are not in a position to sympathize with the working people. The Secretary of the Treasury controls the supply of money. It is to their interest to make the supply short, so money will be higher and commodities and labor cheap.

THE MELLONS' WEALTH

Mr. Mellon and his brother owned and controlled about $500,000,000 worth of property when he became Secretary of the Treasury. When he was pardoned by the President for illegally holding office, from 1921 to 1932, Mr. Mellon and his brother owned and controlled approximately $8,000,000,000 worth of property. The property is itemized in an article entitled "My Brother and I" in the World's Work Magazine for March, 1932.

CONFLICTING INTERESTS

We will presume that Mr. Mellon always considered a question from the standpoint of the public welfare when his own interests were involved. Almost daily his own business interests conflicted with a public duty he was charged with performing as Sercetary of the Treasury. For instance, if he should rule that a certain taxpayer is entitled to a small tax refund for the year 1918, he would probably find that ruling cited as an authority for giving one of his own companies millions of dollars for the same year. He and his companies did receive large refunds from the Treasury Department while he was Secretary of the Treasury. The refunds were made in secret and the records are not subject to inspection.

SECRET TAX SYSTEM

Furthermore, let it be understood that I do not accuse Mr. Mellon of dishonesty. I have no right to. The records and facts are all secret and nobody can see them. He made enormous tax refunds to his own companies, and many refunds to himself. Could you go down there and find out how much he gave himself? Yes. But why he did so is a secret. Could you find out that he gave one of his companies $3,000,000 at one time and another company $1,500,000 at another time on the pretense—I presume it was true; I have no right to dispute—that they had overpaid their income tax back in 1917 and 1918? You could find out that he has done it, but why is it a secret; and you can not find it out, I do not care if you are a representative of the people, for you have no right to go down there and look at these records, and they will not let you see those records, and this tax secrecy is at least partly responsible for this big deficit in the Treasury that we have to-day. Many of the refunds would not have been made if the records were subject to public inspection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. My colleague has sufficiently punished him, because, as Napoleon was banished to the island of St. Helena, so has my colleague banished Mellon to the island of the Court of St. James.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Can not the Joint Commission on Taxation secure the information the gentleman refers to?

Mr. PATMAN. Where the refund is over $75,000 they have a right to examine the cases, but under $75,000 they have not.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. But the gentleman has been talking about millions.

Mr. PATMAN. Let me tell you what actually happened. Take the matter of the United States Steel Corporation. They filed an application for a tax refund for 1917, 1918, 1919, 1920, and 1921, practically every year. That was not allowed until 10 years and 11 months later, and then how many records did they have in those cases? Six truck loads, and they were all delivered to the committee at one time and the committee was told that they should find out if they could where a mistake had been made.

Why, it would take from now until doomsday to examine those cases. There should be some way that interested parties could keep up with what is going on. Why wait until six truck loads of records are accumulated before they are passed on and say to the companies, "Here is $100,000,000, and, in addition to that, 6 per cent interest, not from 1925 but from 1917 and 1918"? In some instances the interest amounted to almost as much as the principal.

SECRECY IN GOVERNMENT

A lot has been said lately in the newspapers about secrecy in government. We have tax laws that are secretly administered. The taxes are paid in secret and the money is refunded in secret. Do you believe that our Government should administer its tax laws in that manner so that a taxpayer or even a representative of the people can not find out whether or not the laws are legally administered? I do not believe that you would say that that is a fair way to administer the tax law. I do not believe that you would say that any official of our Government should have the power to pay out millions and millions of dollars without any public inspection of the public records.

ARE CLERK'S RECORDS SECRET?

I have noticed in newspapers recently that the Clerk's records of this House are considered secret. I never heard of that before. One newspaper in my district said that a newspaper reporter had been trying to find out whom Congressmen had on the pay roll. He said he went to the Clerk and the Clerk said that the records were secret. I do not believe those records are secret and I doubt the Clerk telling him they were secret. I believe they are public records and public records should be open to public inspection; and if there is any rule or regulation that makes them secret that rule or regulation should be canceled because it is not right. Public funds should be administered subject to public inspection.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. The Clerk of the House of Representatives makes a report to Congress annually, and in that report he shows what employees drew salaries as employees of the House of Representatives for the entire fiscal year, and the gentleman can secure it in the document room.

Mr. BLANTON. And it is a public record open to everybody.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Certainly.

ANY TAXPAYER SHOULD BE PERMITTED TO INSPECT THE RECORDS

Mr. PATMAN. The criticism in one newspaper was that the information was withheld so long that it was almost without interest when it was received, but I see no reason why every month's record should not be published. I do not think any Member of Congress would object to that. There is no reason why he should. Public money should be expended in a manner that will be subject to public inspection, and any taxpayer of the Nation should be privileged to inspect the record.

Mr. BLACK. The most secret conferences ever held in Washington are the meetings of the Cabinet. Try to find out what happens in the Cabinet meeting.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, the newspaper boys do that all the time. They let us know the next day what happens in the Cabinet meeting.

Relative to the annual report of the Clerk, if my colleague will look back, he will see that I was the author of the legislation that requires the Clerk of the House of Representatives to print a public annual report showing in itemized detail all of the moneys received by him, and all of the disbursements made by him, both as to salaries under his jurisdiction and the current expenses of the House of Representatives. This report is a public document, and is open to the inspection of any citizen of the United States.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a copy of a letter which the Comptroller of the Currency would send to anyone making inquiry as to what constituted an investment security within the terms of his order.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The letter is as follows:

Your letter of — is received, inclosing circular with respect to —, and requesting to be advised whether they would be a lawful investment for a national bank.

The eligibility of securities as "investment securities" for national banks is governed by section 5136, United States Revised Statutes, as amended by the act of February 25, 1927, and the regulations of this office dated June 30, 1927, a copy of which is inclosed, further defining the term "investment securities."

You can readily appreciate that this office can not go further than it has by the issuance of the regulations and attempt in advance to pass upon the eligibility of specific securities. To do so would be a gigantic task, as it would entail passing upon the entire field of security issues, for not only does it mean passing upon a specific issue for your bank but means passing upon security issues for the entire national banking system and the many security houses and dealers. The most this office can do is to lay down a guiding definition, as has been done, and the board of directors of each bank must, in making investments, apply it. There should be no difficulty in so doing. If there were any doubt as to whether a security falls within the provisions of the act and the regulations, the investment should not be made, for in the last analysis the burden of proof of eligibility rests on the bank. In applying the regulations, your specific attention is called to paragraph 3 on page 2.

Mr. GILBERT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield.

Mr. GILBERT. I gather from the gentleman's remarks that the gentleman agrees with me, that the protection of people in their investments by law is an absolute impossibility? Have not all blue sky laws proven ineffective?

Mr. PATMAN. I would not say that, because I am not familiar with all of them.

Mr. GILBERT. After all, the sage was right when he said, "A fool and his money are soon parted." There is no way to prevent that by law.

Mr. PATMAN. If the Members will bear with me a few moments, I want to mention some matters that have come up in the last few days.

There is what is known as the National Economy Committee. This committee presented a petition for redress of grievances to the President and the Congress of the United States a few days ago. In that petition it is stated that 25 per cent of the income of our Nation, or about $1,000,000,000, is being expended for veterans of wars. They do not say it, but the inference has gone out all over the country that the Congress is authorizing the expenditure of a billion dollars a year for World War veterans. That is being published all over the country. It is not true. Nothing like that is true. The Congress of the United States is not authorizing the expenditure of much more than one-half that much for veterans of the World War. I want to tell you why it is not. It is true that the total appropriation will aggregate almost $1,000,000,000 for all wars and for the Military and Naval Establishments, which are peace-time establishments, so far as this appropriation is concerned.

The Regular Establishments spend $225,000,000 of this every year. The World War veterans get $117,000,000 a year for military and naval insurance, and it is now being charged up to them. Yes; they get it, but they paid for it themselves. When they went into the Army, they were induced and persuaded to purchase insurance from the United States Government, and practically every one of them had deducted from his pay, from $6.60 to $10 a month, out of $30 a month, in order to pay for the Government life insurance. Now, because they took that insurance and are now collecting from that insurance, they are being charged with raiding the Treasury to the extent of the amount they are receiving by reason of the insurance that they paid for. I do not think that is a fair criticism.

They claim there is $115,000,000 spent for hospitalization, including salaries and expenses of the officers who have charge of the hospitals, and the doctors and experts, and so forth. That is true, but part of that should be charged up to veterans of other wars, because they use the hospitals, too. Why charge it all up to veterans of the World War?

They charge up $104,000,000 for disability allowance, and this petition "redress of grievances" has a great deal to say about allowing them this disability allowance, criticising the Government for allowing it to them. Let it be remembered that a large part of the men who are drawing this $18 a month for a 74 per cent disability are really entitled to a service-connected disability and entitled to $74 a month; but because their records have been destroyed or lost they are unable to make proof, and they have not had the assistance that others have had, therefore they are required to take $18 a month instead; and when they take it, they are being criticized by this body, saying it is not right for them to receive that money. Why was that disability allowance law passed? I know why it was passed. We tried to pass a law that would take care of those cases which really had service connection. That was known as the Rankin bill. That covered service-connected cases which really could not make the proof required by law. The bill passed the House and the Senate, and the President vetoed it and his veto was sustained.

Then they introduced what was known as the disability allowance bill. It is nothing more than a pension law. No one denies it is a pension, but who put the pension system upon this country so far as the World War veteran is concerned? The President sent that bill down here, so we were told. We had never seen it. We had never read it. It was never referred to a committee. It was never passed on by a committee. The rules were suspended, and in 40 minutes it passed the House without being subject to amendment. It passed the Senate immediately and became law.

So if the President of the United States is having this body criticized for a pension system, I think it comes with very poor grace from him when we tried to save the country from a pension system by bringing within the terms of the law those cases which really were service connected but which were unable to make proper proof.

That happened on June 26, 1930. The bill came in here like a thunderclap out of a clear sky. No one had seen it nor heard of it. No committee had passed on it. The rules were suspended, and the bill was passed immediately.

I now yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman has covered the point I intended to ask about. That bill never was referred to the Veterans' Committee nor to any other committee.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield for a short question.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. In reference to the bill the gentleman is speaking about, did not that bill come down here after the veto?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes; it did after the veto.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Did not that bill go to a committee?

Mr. PATMAN. It did not go to a committee.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. How did it get on the floor of the House?

Mr. PATMAN. It was introduced, given a number, and printed. The Speaker recognized Mr. JOHNSON to bring the bill up under suspension of the rules. If I am not correct, I want to be corrected now.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is correct.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman is correct; I recollect the circumstances now.

Mr. PATMAN. It is said in criticism that the money to be used to pay the veterans their adjusted-service certificates is printing-press money, fiat money, and things like that. That is merely the use of a coined phrase in order to condemn the proposal. Former Senator Owen, who is in New York City at this time, called me over the long-distance telephone this morning and had me take down this message:

The public press criticises your amended bill for paying the adjusted-service certificates in Treasury notes, calling such Treasury notes fiat money and printing-press money.

It is the only way in which you could use the public credit for issuing money because the Federal reserve bank notes and Federal reserve notes both involve the credit of the Federal reserve banks and would be a matter of controversy, but the Treasury notes, backed by the gold standard act of March 14, 1900, have both all the gold available in the Treasury and the credit of the United States behind such notes by a sweeping formal statutory enactment. Your bill goes much farther than that. It provides for the cancellation of said notes if the Federal Reserve Board finds the amount excessive and if the purchasing power of the dollar falls below the average value ascertained by the Department of Labor for the year 1926.

To call said money fiat money is either due to lack of understanding or information or lack of intelligence, unless perhaps your bill is being deliberately misrepresented.

Senator Owen is one of the best, if not the best informed man on banking and currency in America. He was a coauthor of the Federal reserve act and 10 years chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency in the Senate.

The following article appeared as an editorial in Labor, a national weekly, May 3, 1932:

SANDBAGGING THE BANKS

In an article entitled "Sandbagging the Bankers," printed in the current issue of a popular magazine, PATMAN, of Texas, a young Congressman who has attracted unusual attention during his brief service in the House, frames a serious indictment of the management of our banking system during the last three administrations.

Until the Harding administration, says Mr. PATMAN, banks in places of less than 50,000 inhabitants made nearly all their loans to local borrowers on local security. Then the Comptroller of the Currency "advised" these banks to build up a "secondary reserve" of outside securities. Since the comptroller has the power of life and death over banks they obeyed.

"By the time of the stock-market crash in 1929," says PATMAN, "practically half the money which country banks formerly had loaned in their respective communities had been taken out of the communities and invested in outside securities."

After the crash, Mr. PATMAN reports that the comptroller urged these banks to cut down their local loans, and this is the result:

"Country bankers," he continues, "say that their loss on local loans during the last 10 years has been less than 1 per cent a year, while their losses in securities purchased on recommendation of the Comptroller of the Currency has amounted to 50 per cent, 75 per cent; in some cases almost to 100 per cent.

"This policy has resulted in hundreds of banks closing their doors, while those still open for business are unable to furnish ordinary banking facilities to the residents of their communities."

If Mr. PATMAN is correct, forced purchase of securities by country banks must have contributed materially to the ballooning of prices before the crash. In other words, the change in policy was designed to facilitate the sale of bonds of doubtful value, without regard to the effect on legitimate business and the safety of deposits.

This is a grave charge and, it seems to Labor, is well worthy the attention of a congressional committee.

SALES TAX FALLACY

Prominent officials of the United States are claiming that the Government will almost go into bankruptcy unless Congress passes a sales tax. They expect to displace the income tax, which is the fairest tax on earth, by a sales tax which will place the burdens of the National Government on the poor. Such a tax should never be imposed. The people who would pay it are the ones who are now paying taxes on what they owe in order to support the cities, counties, road districts, school districts, and States.

THE WEALTH OF THE NATION

Let us see how near bankruptcy our Nation is. The wealth of the Nation is $400,000,000,000. The Government owes $17,500,000,000, and from this should be subtracted $12,500,000,000 owed to the Government by the railroads, banks, and foreign countries, which is evidenced by their signed obligations. Without considering what is owed to the Government, our national debt is only 4½ per cent of the national wealth. After the Civil War, our country owed 10 per cent of the national wealth. At this time France owes 20 per cent of her national wealth, England 40 per cent of hers, and Germans much more than that. This information is not offered as a justification for extravagance, but is given to refute the argument that the country will be bankrupt if the sales tax is defeated. The increased taxes from incomes in one year of prosperity will pay the deficit of many years. The Government should be economically administered. Money should not be taken from the people in the form of taxes to be wasted or used for unnecessary enterprises.

CONGRESS SHOULD REGULATE THE VALUE OF MONEY

The Constitution of the United States says that Congress shall coin money and regulate its value. Because a few of us are asking that this constitutional mandate be assumed by Congress for the purpose of breaking this panic, it is claimed that we are asking for the kind of inflation the people of Germany and Russia experienced a few years ago. A few international bankers have been issuing the money and regulating its value by contraction and expansion of the currency; this power should be taken away from them; present conditions present the best argument in favor of such a proposal. The people are studying the money problem as they have never studied it before. They are going to get the facts. When they do, their representatives in Congress will be required to carry out their will. Then there will be some changes made for the benefit of the people. Mr. Dawes said, "It is dangerous to tinker with the currency system." It has not only been dangerous but destructive to the people for Mr. Dawes and a few other international bankers to tinker with it for their own benefit as they have done.

IDLE GOLD SHOULD BE USED

Two and one-half billion dollars of new money can be issued by our Government on the idle gold that is in the Treasury. If it can be distributed over the Nation in payment of services or obligations, it will be placed in the banks. Every dollar of new money will be a basis for $10 of credit. How much is $2,000,000,000? One-half of 1 per cent of our national wealth; one-fourth of the amount given to Europe by the United States; less than one-third of the wealth of Andrew Mellon and his brother.

WHAT GOVERNMENT IS SPENDING FOR VETERANS

The Government is now spending 25 per cent of its income on veteran relief. Only about 12½ per cent for relief of World War Veterans. What of it? Relief for veterans of wars is purely a matter for National Government. Local governments spend nothing for such relief. It is not their duty. You can pick up the tax receipt of most any citizen and say, "Why you are spending 50 per cent of your tax money for roads, or 50 per cent for schools, or 25 per cent to support the government of a certain city." There is no news to that. But if the Government was spending 50 per cent of its income for building highways and the local district was spending 50 per cent of its income for veterans, there would be room for talk.

PENSIONS AFTER CIVIL WAR

Fourteen years after the Civil War the Government was spending more for veterans' relief than is being spent now for the relief of the World War veterans, considering the wealth of the Nation then and now—the ability of the Nation to pay. If we presume that the Southern States were spending as much for veteran relief by reason of the Civil War as the National Government was spending on the Union soldiers, there was twice as much money spent for veteran relief 14 years after the Civil War as is being spent now. In addition, a dollar then would buy more than it will to-day.

DEFLATION DESTRUCTIVE

Deflation is destroying our country. Our greatest and best-informed citizens declare that it was unnecessary and deliberately caused. I wonder if it was brought on to force people to pay three and four dollars in commodities for every dollar of bonds they voted on themselves to make public improvements. The bonds are held by the deflationists; interest on the bonds is increased in proportion. This situation can be cured. Congress must cure it or take the blame. The people can not pay inflated debts with deflated incomes caused by low-priced commodities and small salaries.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Mr. Chairman, during my absence from the floor I understand my distinguished colleague from Texas launched another attack on the generals and on the Army and Navy Club.

Mr. BLANTON. But I notified the gentleman an hour before I spoke that I was going to discuss those matters and asked him to be present.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. I do not think my distinguished colleague and his friend from Tennessee should take their defeat so seriously in a fair up and down fight. The question was before one of the standing committees of this House and before the Committee of the Whole of this House, and eventually on a vote of this House they were cleaned up in a fair and square fight. Why can they not take their defeat gracefully and stop whining about it? The truth of the matter is I am tired of this misrepresentation about the saving of $100,000,000. I saw in a St. Louis newspaper, coming from the district of my distinguished friend from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN], that he held me responsible for tacking onto this country $100,000,000 of expense through the defeat of the Army and Navy consolidation.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. I yield. The gentleman gave an interview to one of the local correspondents of that paper.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I generally read the papers from my own city, but I saw no story charging the gentleman with being responsible. The gentleman, of course, assisted to defeat the bill. I charged the President of the United States with being responsible for defeating the bill by informing the country and the House of Representatives, not in a direct message but otherwise, that he opposed the consolidation of the Army and Navy.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Then the gentleman has been misquoted. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. If that statement was included in the story, I failed to see it. The gentleman, of course, would not deny his opposition to the bill. What it would have saved is debatable, but I feel it would save fifty to one hundred million if properly administered.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. The gentleman has been misquoted. As a matter of fact, as I stated on this floor, that proposition was nothing short of humbuggery. It would not have saved one dollar or one dime of additional expense.

Rather it would have been an extravagance. It would have added to the public expense. That was demonstrated through a long committee hearing, through long sessions, through testimony, and truth is truth and must prevail. But my friend, to further his cause, brings in that poor old moth-eaten Army and Navy Club. He tries to make it appear that social influences and these gilded generals are responsible for his defeat, that they have unusual influence in this House. I want to assure my friend from Texas, the great champion of the poor and downtrodden, that he would be a wealthy man in the Army and Navy Club, among those poor Army and Navy officers, and if he would but inform himself on that club, just as he has not informed himself on the Army and Navy consolidation tax measure, he would probably quit this harping on the Army and Navy Club and also on this consolidation.

As a matter of fact, a very distinguished Member of this body, a former outstanding chairman of the Appropriations Committee, John Fitzgerald, of Brooklyn, than whom no more distinguished man has ever ornamented this House, was invited to join this Army and Navy Club. He said, "No; I do not want to join that club, because those fellows will be logrolling all the time; they will bother the life out of me for appropriations and promotions. No; I do not want to join that club." But at last his friends prevailed on him and he did join. After being a member for years and after enjoying his associations at the club, he said, "The only objection I have to it is that when I go in there they do not even speak to me. I have been subjected to no pressure or logrolling." What better testimony could you have than that?

Mr. BLANTON. He was not in their class. They were exercising their seniority. He was beneath their notice.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. The gentleman thinks, then, they would logroll with him but not with Mr. Fitzgerald?

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman would find that they would treat him the very same way they treated Mr. Fitzgerald. They would absolutely ignore him.

Mr. BLANTON. Only generals and admirals would be recognized?

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. I do not know but that would be a sensible thing to do with the gentleman from Texas. Some of them are very wise men. The difference, if you will pardon this personal allusion, between the gentleman from Texas and myself is that he is a politician and I am a statesman. [Applause.] The difference between a politician and a statesman is this, that you are looking out for the fall elections, while I am looking out for succeeding generations.

Mr. BLANTON. I never did that in my life. I never looked out for elections. The people take care of me.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. I come from a district which is overwhelmingly Republican, and as a Democrat I had to fight for my election, not in a primary election but in a general election. We have two parties in Oregon.

Mr. BLANTON. My district went for Hoover 11,000 votes in 1928, and went for me 48,000. My constituents exercise their own judgment——

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. And yet the gentleman prides himself on his Democracy. [Applause.] What kind of Democrats have you in your district?

Mr. BLANTON. And sometimes send Republicans here and sometimes Democrats.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. We send Democrats when they are the right kind of Democrats. Going to the subject of statesmanship, I am going to dwell just a few minutes on a great question that is coming before this House to-morrow, a statesmanship problem, not a political problem, not a fall-election problem, but a problem for all time for this country, and that is the question of the preservation of the national defense. I am not going into all the details of that because I have not the time. I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. After the Civil War the armies that had been organized during that conflict were disbanded and the Regular Army was reduced to a mere handful compared with the size of this great Nation. It was stationed very largely in the western part of the country and was engaged in protection of the rapidly moving frontier in its progress across the continent. At the outbreak of the Spanish War it consisted of 2,179 officers and 25,353 enlisted men. (Annual Report of Secretary of War, June 30, 1897.)

The operations of the Spanish War brought vividly to light the weakness of the Army and its total lack of a modern staff. The success that we attained was against an even more poorly prepared nation, and a serious catastrophy might have been our lot had our opponent been even moderately prepared for the conflict.

The one improvement that resulted from the Spanish War was the creation and organization of a general staff. Even though this staff was not sufficient in numbers to perform the duties that its name presupposed, it did provide a body of selected officers whose duty it was to think about problems of national defense and to make plans therefor.

The Army was enlarged during the 15 years that followed the Spanish War, and the outbreak of the World War in 1914 found this Nation with 4,701 officers and 87,781 enlisted men (exclusive of the Philippine Scouts). (Annual Report of Secretary of War, June 30, 1914.)

Almost from the outbreak of the World War situations arose in which the interests of this country were involved and which led thinking people to fear that howsoever much we might desire to remain neutral we were in danger of being dragged into the world conflict. Among the leading statesmen who gave their attention to this problem were the Hon. George E. Chamberlain, Senator from Oregon, who was chairman of the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate, and the Hon. James Hay, chairman of the Military Affairs Committee of the House, both of them of the Democratic Party.

Various proposals were suggested during the last half of 1914 and the first half of 1915 and many plans were submitted for consideration. None of these met with popular approval nor with the approval of the Committees on Military Affairs, either of the House or of the Senate. In the late summer of 1915 these two committees decided to make use of the voluminous hearings that had been held on this subject and to draft legislation, which, in their opinion, would more nearly meet the needs and desires of the Nation than any of the other plans that had been proposed.

These committees brought to this work a thorough knowledge of the Military Establishment, a knowledge of the national temperament, and vivid memories of the Spanish War which fitted them preeminently to deal with the subject. In addition to that they were singularly free from preconceived ideas and were determined to produce a new plan of national defense which would be a consistent whole and be free from the weaknesses and objections arising out of piecemeal legislation which had characterized the acts effecting the Military Establishment for the preceding 50 years. They determined to treat the Army as a whole; to study the fundamental needs of the Nation, and to reorganize each and every part of the Military Establishment, having in mind the duties and responsibilities of each component as a part of a new machine.

I am entirely safe in asserting that no such approach to our military problem had ever been made within the memory of man then living. Every arm and service of the military establishment was studied separately regarding the duties with which it was charged under the laws and regulations, and each and every one was then studied with regard to its part in the machine as a whole. The armies of foreign nations were likewise examined as to the proportions existing amongst the various arms and as to the organization and functions of each part.

The committees of the House and Senate worked long and patiently on the draft of this bill, later known as the national defense act of (June 3) 1916, and finally produced in a conference between the two committees the first comprehensive bill dealing with that subject that we have ever had on our statute books.

For many reasons, well known to each of you, amongst which are the temper of this Nation toward a large standing army, the difficulties of adjusting conflicting ideas in regard to military matters, and the necessity of reasonable economy even in such vital matters as national defense, the national defense act of 1916 did not satisfy the desires of the more militant of our population and exceeded those of more pacifistic tendencies. However, it struck a happy medium between the two extremes and it did set up a well-balanced land force such as we had never had before, providing for an army of 11,268 officers and 217,750 enlisted men, exclusive of the Philippine Scouts.

The act which finally passed the House and Senate was approved by President Wilson on June 3, 1916. The provisions were to be put into effect over a period of five years. Before the end of the first year, however, we found ourselves at war with Germany and her allies. Very fortunately for this country this act provided for a very material expansion of the Regular Army, on a sound basis, and hasty, ill-considered legislation for the land forces immediately upon the outbreak of war was unnecessary.

Our experience during the World War naturally taught us many lessons that were not known when this act was passed. In that we were no different from all the other nations that participated in the World War, and following the end of that war the national defense act was amended in many particulars by the act of June 4, 1920.

A new system was devised, essentially American, and written into the national defense act. It represents one of the greatest and most constructive developments evolved by the American Government in recent years. By a combination of a small professional force to act as a training cadre and nucleus, and the utilization of various types and classes of citizens trained in the military art, there has resulted for the first time in the history of this country a more or less adequate preparation for any eventuality, and at a cost within reasonable figures. Different types of citizen soldiers have been provided for so that inducement is offered for practically every group within the country. These consist of the National Guard, the Officers' Reserve Corps, the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, the citizens' military training camps, the National Rifle Association, and various classifications of military schools and colleges. The Regular Army, of course, is the bulwark and basis of the structure. The national defense act provided that it should consist of 18,000 officers and 285,000 men. This strength has been progressively decreased in the past decade and now has reached a figure of approximately 12,000 officers and 125,000 men. This is below the point of safety.

Other amendments have been made to the basic act of June 3, 1916, but none of them, including the amendment of 1920, has changed its fundamental provisions. All of these amendments together are not to be considered in importance when compared with the fundamental changes that the original defense act of 1916 made in the provisions of the law that existed previous to its passage.

I have briefly rehearsed these facts in order to demonstrate that all the fundamental provisions of existing law in regard to our land forces were produced from the minds of great men in our own party and that the fundamental provisions of existing law are the results of neither haphazard nor hastily considered legislation. They are the products not only of mature thinking in regard to our national needs but also of long experience in legislative matters affecting the Army, and any changes therein ought to be made only after the same processes and in the light of further experience.

Without any desire to cast aspersions upon my colleagues, I feel prepared to say that the statesmen who considered and developed the national defense act were the equal of those of us who are handling this problem to-day. I am more than equally prepared to say that the knowledge that we have gained during the 16 years since that act was passed leads to the belief that we are in need of more rather than less strength in our land forces, and only a due regard for economy in these trying times deters me from so proposing.

Our interests that must be defended grow as time passes, and just as one increases his fire insurance with the increase in the value of his home, so the strength of the forces charged with our national defense should logically be expected to increase with the population and growth of our country.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, this morning's papers carry the story of a so-called "nonpartisan," political conference held at the White House Sunday night. Instead of the President holding his weekly political conference at Rapidan yesterday and fishing for trout and goggle-eyed perch in the mountain streams, our Chief Executive is evidently continuing to fish for ways and means to lay the blame for the stupidity and waste of the first three years and more of the Hoover administration on the backs of this House merely because the Democrats have a bare five or six majority.

If press reports are true, the President's usual Sunday political conference was behind closed doors, and only the high moguls of the Republican Party were invited. It is stated that the conference lasted far into the night, and it was finally decided to call it a "nonpartisan" conference and that it was decided that Congress should again be asked to pass the President's so-called nonpartisan program of alleged economy. No Democrats attended or were invited.

The Washington Post, that is probably the most rock-ribbed, uncompromising Republican newspaper in America and that usually expresses supreme satisfaction at any move of the President, is evidently becoming disgusted, judging from an editorial appearing in to-day's Post that is a severe but just indictment of the tactics of the President, and especially with reference to Sunday's White House conference.

Ever since the inauguration of the present occupant of the White House the country has been "propaganded" with the slogan, "Stand by the President." This has been the watchword of extreme partisan newspapers and many Republican politicians.

Occasionally I have received letters from Republican friends in Oklahoma that usually began and ended with that time-worn slogan, and it matters little whether it be a high tariff bill, a moratorium on foreign war debts, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, or any other of the many measures by and for the international bankers. Because it happens to be a pet measure of the President there are a few good citizens of my State who are so blindly partisan that they write or wire me to by all means "stand by the President."

The fact that Congress has too long stood by the President in his rampage of extravagance, waste, and stupidity is largely responsible for the depleted condition of the Federal Treasury and for the necessity of balancing the Budget. At the beginning of the Hoover administration Congress was called upon to give the President a Federal farm board, and many Democrats joined Republicans in giving the President an opportunity to help stabilize prices of farm commodities. This has been jokingly called the first of the President's many "noble experiments." Anyway, it was only the first of many mighty expensive experiments. Farm prices have gradually declined from almost the very hour the President's Farm Board was appointed. Cotton has gone down from 10 to 12 cents a pound to 4 and 5 cents, and wheat has tumbled from $1.18 to 30 cents per bushel.

The next White House experiment was the Hawley-Smoot-Grundy tariff bill. Many Democrats who had reluctantly yielded to the plea to give the President a free hand in appointing a farm board could not in good conscience hold their noses and vote for the administration's tariff bill. During those long weeks that the tariff bill was pending some of my best friends in Oklahoma wrote and wired me to "discard politics and stand by the President." In the face of the fact that administration leaders gave many assurances to Congress and the country that this Republican high-tariff measure would restore prosperity within 60 days after its passage, I not only refused to vote for it but spoke against it on the floor of this House, and used every honorable means to bring about its defeat. Congress then, with an overwhelming Republican majority, did the bidding of the White House and passed the most outrageous, unscientific, unfair, and unreasonable high tariff bill ever enacted in the history of any Congress. More than 30 nations of the world have retaliated against America by raising their tariff walls, and to-day the American farmer has no market for his products in any country on the face of the earth.

But, Mr. Chairman, that is not all of the expensive experiments in which the Hoover administration has indulged.

When this Congress convened last December, after the Chief Executive had taken it upon himself to promise the international bankers, and incidentally certain European nations, that the United States would grant a moratorium to some of the foreign governments, I was besieged with letters and telegrams from many Republicans and a few misguided Democrats to stand by the President. We were assured that at last our internationally minded President had made his master stroke; a master political stroke to be sure, but one that would without doubt revive business and hasten the end of the depression. It would be political suicide and decidedly unpatriotic to oppose the President's moratorium, so we were warned. But I not only voted against the moratorium but made a speech on the floor of the House against it. Had the White House demanded that the international bankers also declare a moratorium on their private loans to Europe, there might have been some justification for his course [applause], but no such demands were made. The gold that had been shipped to America by Europe and that would have aided much to replenish a depleted Treasury, never left Wall Street. It was not shipped back to Europe but remained in the vaults of the international bankers.

When it began to percolate through to the country that the President's moratorium was really a dole to the international bankers and that Congress and the country had been tricked and deceived, another series of experiments was begun, the first of which was the so-called Reconstruction Finance Corporation. What a high-sounding name they gave this—another Wall Street baby! [Applause.] The administration propaganda went forth and again we were admonished to stand by the President. We were assured this would ease up money matters and quickly cure the depression. I could not vote for that bill but many Democrats of this House did so, hoping it would prove to be all they felt in their hearts it was not.

Then, when the country found that the $2,000,000,000 Finance Corporation was really a dole for big business and not relief for the little man, another "experiment" was essential. We were then handed a Federal land-bank measure, but when passed it proved to be a bondholders' bill. I had introduced a measure proposing a 2-year moratorium on Federal land-bank loans and reluctantly supported the President's land bank bill, but when I asked the Federal land bank to ease up on foreclosures against the farmers of my district and reminded them of the passage of the Federal land bank act I was given to understand in a polite way that instead of being a farm relief bill it was primarily for the relief of the bondholders of the Federal land bank.

After the present Congress had passed several pet measures of the White House that turned out to be doles to big business, by and for Wall Street and other special interests, we first heard the Executive plea for economy. The President wanted Congress to turn the reorganization of the various departments over to him alone; but remembering his unprecedented record for creating new high-salaried commissions that seldom meet or report to Congress, this body did not choose to do so. A House Economy Committee appointed by the Speaker, after many weeks of investigations and study, brought in a comprehensive, intelligent, and progressive program as a whole, the more important provisions of which were eliminated by administration leaders on this floor who always follow the President.

This week I received a letter from a prominent business man of Oklahoma, in which he severely criticized Congress for its dilatory tactics, its failure to materially reduce expenses of the Federal Government, for its failure to combine the Army and Navy under one head and thus save seventy-five to one hundred million dollars a year; and then to my surprise he closed by urging me to stand by the President. I agree, Mr. Chairman, that Congress has been dilatory in cutting expenses of government, and has failed in many ways to live up to the expectations of the country, but just how anyone could seriously talk of economy and at the same time advocate that Congress stand by the President is beyond my imagination. It is conceded that the President and his Cabinet officers, who are supposed to speak for him, and the high-powered Army and naval officers are directly responsible for the failure of many provisions of the House economy bill, including the one proposing to combine the Army and Navy under one Bureau of National Defense. The fact that one of the President's several $10,000 secretaries, whom the Government furnishes a big Lincoln car and a chauffeur, came on the floor of Congress and buttonholed Members of the House and lobbied against many provisions of the economy bill, including the Army and Navy proposal, is significant.

The recent outburst against Congress by the Chief Executive and his appeal to the country to "help him make Congress economize" is the latest "master" political stroke. It is like a drowning man grasping for a straw. Personally, I voted for every provision in the House economy bill proposing to reduce expenditures of government except one that was manifestly unfair to disabled war veterans. I not only have voted to reduce my own salary and office expense, including my stationery allowance, which in fact is now far below what it costs any Congressman who actually answers all of his mail, but I supported the proposal to combine the Army and Navy under one head, and thus save an additional hundred million dollars. As I said before, that and many other provisions were eliminated because of the active opposition of the White House.

If the Chief Executive had loved the dear people in November as he professes to in May, his plea to the country to "help him make Congress economize" might come with better grace. Congress provides the President with an army of experts to figure out and advise the lowest possible dollar on which the respective departments and bureaus of government could function. That estimate was submitted at the beginning of the present session and Congress has cut the President's Budget estimate 10 per cent or more for every department and bureau, and in each instance such cuts were made over the vehement protest of the heads of such departments. All told, Congress has reduced the Budget estimate of the President more than $168,000,000 below White House estimates. [Applause.]

The most absurd and unreasonable political propaganda is that calling on Members of Congress to stand by the President and his multimillionaire Secretary of the Treasury in matters of taxation. This House passed a revenue bill that raised the income tax materially in the higher brackets. At the time the revenue bill was pending, in a speech on this floor I said among other things:

> But, answering the question, "What would I do about it?" Aside from increasing the surtax, corporation tax, and income tax, I would reenact the excess-profits tax that brought in over $300,000,000 in 1921, but that is left out of this bill. Then I would cut expenses of this Government to the bone before calling on the people for additional taxes. I would abolish countless commissions and overlapping and useless boards and bureaus. You can not cut too much for me.

Not only did I advocate increasing the income tax in the higher brackets, but I was persistent in advocating a real tax of not less than 1 per cent on all sales of stock exchanges. That would have brought to the Treasury $300,000,000 to $400,000,000 each year. In my speech on the floor of this House on this subject last March I said, in part:

> These Wall Street gamblers do not confine themselves to intangible stocks, mythical securities, and bogus memorandums, but they gamble to the tune of billions of dollars on commodities they never see but which are produced by the sweat of the brows of millions of honest, hard-working farmers of America. Instead of prices of farm commodities being based on the law of supply and demand, they are too often controlled by and held at the mercy of Wall Street stock gamblers. [Applause.]

After the House had placed an insignificant tax of one-fourth of 1 per cent on the stock exchanges the Secretary of the Treasury appeared before a Senate committee and induced the Senate to adopt the Hoover-Mills plan reducing the taxation in the higher brackets, eliminating all the tax on stock exchanges, and letting the burden of governmental expense fall more heavily on the shoulders of the poor. That is the "constructive" tax plan Democrats are called on to support; that demonstrates the type of leadership we are asked to follow; that is the so-called nonpartisan program we are urged and implored to embrace.

In conclusion let me say that I do not pretend to speak for others, but as for myself I can not in good conscience turn my back on every fundamental principle of government I have held for a lifetime and support such a program, even though it may be that of the President of the United States. [Applause.]

Be it enacted, etc.

The partners of a partnership and the executive officers of a corporation or other association registered as a dealer shall not be salesmen within the meaning of this definition, nor shall such clerical or other employees of a registered dealer as are employed for work to which the sale of securities is secondary and incidental. "Registered salesman" shall mean a salesman registered under the provisions of this act.

(b) The term "include," when used in a definition contained in this act, shall not be deemed to exclude other things or persons otherwise within the meaning of the term defined. In the interpretation of this act, words importing the masculine gender shall be held to include all genders, except where such construction would be unreasonable.

(c) The provisions of this act shall not apply to any receiver, referee, administrator, executor, guardian, or other person appointed or acting under the judgment or order of any court, nor to any public officer while performing his official duty, nor to any national bank or trust company organized under an act of the Congress and transacting business as a bank or trust company within the District of Columbia.

(d) The provisions of this act shall not apply to any sale or offer for sale of securities to any bank, banker, savings bank, trust company, building and loan association, insurance company, or other financial institution, or to any corporation, or to a registered dealer, or to any person engaged in the business of acquiring securities for the purpose of resale to the public; nor to any sale or offer for sale of securities to any syndicate or group formed for the specific purpose of acquiring such securities for resale to the public directly or through other syndicates or groups; nor to any sale or offer for sale of securities upon the floor of any exchange to a dealer in securities; nor to the sale of space for advertising of securities in any newspaper, magazine, or publication; nor to the offering of securities by any person in conjunction with a registered dealer by use of advertisement, circular, or pamphlet, provided such person does not otherwise attempt to sell such securities in the District of Columbia, and that the name of such registered dealer appears in such advertisement, circular, or pamphlet.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, evidently we can not finish this bill to-night. It is nearly 5 o'clock, and I make the point of order there is not a quorum present.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. THOMASON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that the committee having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9064) to supervise and regulate the sale of securities within the District of Columbia, had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. BULWINKLE, on account of important business.

THE DEPRESSION

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a letter addressed to me by ex-Senator Robert L. Owen, on the subject of the depression.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter addressed to me by ex-Senator Robert L. Owen:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 4, 1932.

Hon. HENRY T. RAINEY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

ARE THE DEMOCRATS RESPONSIBLE FOR THE DEPRESSION?

MY DEAR MR. RAINEY: On April 14, 1932, on the first page of a bulletin called "The Republican" published weekly by the Republican National Committee, Charles F. Scott, editor, in the Barr Building, Washington D. C., appeared the charge that the Democratic Party was responsible for the beginning of deflation and that they began it in 1920 and before the Republican Party came into power.

This astounding charge is made in the article referred to which is as follows:

"WHEN DEFLATION BEGAN

"It is an illustration of the brevity of human memory that already the question is being asked, 'When did deflation begin, and who was responsible for it?' And since this question is being asked, it ought to be answered even at the cost of threshing over old straw.

"The first mention of deflation following the war is found in a message which President Wilson sent to Congress on August 8, 1919, when he said:

"'Wheat shipments and credits to facilitate the purchase of our wheat can and will be limited and controlled in such a way as not to raise but rather to lower the price of flour.'

"In December the Federal Reserve Board, all Democrats, put into effect an increase in rates on advances and rediscounts, the immediate result of which was to deflate the currency. On January 10, 1920, the Federal Reserve Board, still all Democrats, notified all member banks that loans from central institutions must be reduced. More deflation. January 23, 1920, the Federal reserve bank again raised their rediscount rate, this time to 6 per cent, the purpose and result being to call loans all over the country.

"Senator Owen, a Democrat, charged that this policy caused a depression of Liberty bonds from 8 to 15 per cent, and a loss to Liberty-bond holders at $3,000,000,000.

"In May, 1920, the Federal Reserve Board, still all Democrats, took further steps toward deflation, and Representative GARNER, Democrat, now Speaker, wrote a formal protest to the board, stating that its deflation policy was proving 'ruinous to the cattle industry in the South and Southwest.'

"Referring to this same period and to the same deflation policy, John Skelton Williams, Comptroller of the Currency during the Wilson administration, and as such a member ex officio of the Federal Reserve Board, on October 19, 1922, in a letter to the New York Times, said:

"'During the most drastic months of deflation, while the system was reducing credit about $100,000,000, the only members of the board who resisted and opposed the board's drastic deflation policy and their radical enforcement were myself and Hon. Henry A. Moehlenpah, of Wisconsin.'

"William G. McAdoo, Democrat, in a signed article in the Manufacturers Record, December 23, 1920, said:

"'The farmers are suffering colossal losses as a result of the drastic deflation which has been put into effect by the Federal Reserve Board.'

"He was referring to the same measures of deflation carried out by the all-Democratic Federal Reserve Board under the Wilson administration.

"The final and conclusive proof as to the time when the deflation of farm prices took place is shown in the market reports themselves. July, 1920, corn was $1.53; September, $1.29; October, 87 cents; and by the following April, 55 cents. Cattle in November, 1920, were $14.57; went to $9.84 in January, and down to $8.09 in June. Wheat, $2.80 in July, $2.01 in December, and $1.43 in the following June. Hogs were $15.88 in July, $9.66 in December. Wool was 90 cents in July and 54 cents in December. Cotton was 39 cents in July and 14 cents in December. All these are Chicago prices.

"Remembering that the Republican administration did not take over the country until March 4, 1921, it will be seen that the drastic deflation which Mr. McAdoo declared was inflicting 'colossal losses upon the farmers,' and which Speaker GARNER protested against on the score that it was proving 'ruinous to the cattle industry in the South and Southwest,' was inaugurated and carried into effect under the Democratic administration."

Obviously, the author of this article, whoever he may be, had given considerable study to the question in order to dig up quotations from the Hon. William G. McAdoo, the Hon. John N. Garner, Hon. John Skelton Williams, and myself. Why should Mr. McAdoo, Mr. Garner, Mr. Williams, and myself be denouncing what the Republican National Committee sets forth as a Democratic policy?

The three members who favored contraction—Harding, Warburg, and Miller—favored a Republican policy and could not be called Democratic. Hamlin and Moehlenpah did not favor it and Williams opposed it.

The charge made by the Republican is either a case of unpardonable ignorance or of shameless political mendacity.

It should be obvious that at the close of the World War, when credit and currency were necessarily expanded to meet the exigencies of national defense, it was done by the Democratic Party as unavoidably necessary to finance the World War, and since the expansion was justified, it could not be called an inflation of credit and currency because it was, in fact, a justified expansion, while inflation means an unjustified expansion.

The political responsibility for contracting credit and currency rests upon the shoulders of the Republican Party, evidence of which will be found in the official records of the United States, and of the Republican Party itself.

In May, 1920, the Hon. Medill McCormick, Republican United States Senator from Illinois, introduced Senate Resolution 363, as follows:

"Resolved, That the Federal Reserve Board be directed to advise the Senate what steps it purposes to take or to recommend to the member banks of the Federal reserve system to meet the existing inflation of currency and credits and consequent high prices, and what further steps it purposes to take or recommend to mobilize credits in order to move the 1920 crop."

He urged this upon the Senate on May 17, 1920, and it passed the Senate unnoticed. He defended it on the floor of the Senate by saying in plain words that the resolution simply asked for information and that "It asks for nothing more." (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 7145).

He defended it as a means of mobilizing credit for the benefit of the farmers of the country and he said in defending it "unless steps are taken to-day to mobilize the necessary credit resources, the farmers will be hard put to it to find money this fall when it is necessary for their very living." (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 7145).

The resolution was adopted without objection and without being understood or attracting any serious notice.

As a matter of fact this resolution was prepared for the Senator from Illinois and was passed for the purpose of influencing the Federal Reserve Board and to support the Federal reserve advisory council which met on May 18, 1920, and of which Mr. James B. Forgan, of Illinois, was the president. They had a Federal Reserve Board conference on the 18th day of May, 1920, in which the members of the Federal Reserve Board, 12 members of the Federal reserve advisory council and 36 Class A directors of the Federal reserve banks, met in a secret meeting and determined by majority vote upon a policy of contracting credit and currency, a full account of which will be found in Senate Document No. 310, 67th Congress, 4th Session, ordered to be printed by the Senate on February 24, 1923.

It is perfectly obvious from this record that this action was taken at the instance of and in behalf of powerful financial interests which controlled the great banks of the country and controlled the Federal reserve banks.

Since it may be conceded that these forces are and have been for many years the financial supporters and campaign contributors of the Republican Party, the origin of this deflation policy is perfectly obvious.

At that time I was chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee of the United States Senate, and I resented the passage of this resolution in my absence from the Senate and the passing of the resolution without reference to the Banking and Currency Committee; and on the following day, May 18, 1920, as the representative of the Democratic administration, I protested against the passage of this unwise and misleading resolution. I vigorously protested against it and said:

"I am personally friendly with every man on the Reserve Board. * * * But I differ with them in policy. I disagree with their policy. I disagree with the advice they are getting. I do not know who is giving the advice, but, whoever it is, I do not agree with the advice. I do not agree with the policy, and I am protesting against this because I believe it is going to lead to an industrial depression. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLean] smiles at these suggestions and must either think it an improbability, or perhaps he welcomes it."

"Mr. MCLEAN. No, Mr. President; I have not much use for prophets of evil and hope the industrial depression will not come. I do not think there is any need for it."

"Mr. OWEN. It will not come with my consent."

It did come with terrifying results, over 6,000 banks failing as one of the results.

The report of the Federal Reserve Board on Senate Resolution 363 appears as Senate Document No. 280, Sixty-sixth Congress, second session, and did not advocate any drastic steps toward deflation, but said in words: "Too rapid deflation will be injurious and should be avoided." That was the language of the Federal Reserve Board.

But the responsibility of the deflation was clearly upon the Federal reserve banks, but they would have assumed no such responsibility except for the formal backing and demand of the Republican Party of the United States.

The responsibility for the depression of 1920–21, due to the contraction of credit and currency at that time, was assumed by the Republican Party in the Republican platform adopted at the Seventeenth National Republican Convention on the 10th day of June, 1920, at Chicago, in which they said:

"We pledge ourselves to earnest and consistent attack upon the high cost of living, by vigorous avoidance of further inflation in our Government borrowing, by courageous and intelligent deflation of overexpanded credit and currency, etc." (P. 103, Official Proceedings of the Seventeenth Republican National Convention.)

Senator Warren G. Harding, the nominee of the Republican Party, was presented with the notice of nomination by Hon. Henry Cabot Lodge, who said, among other things: "Here to-day you * * * will declare your purposes and those of the party you lead" (p. 254), and Senator Harding, Republican candidate for the presidency, said: "Gross expansion of currency and credit has depreciated the dollar just as expansion and inflation have discredited the coin of the world. We inflated in haste; we must deflate in deliberation. * * * We will attempt intelligent and courageous deflation," etc. (p. 266).

Under the sponsorship of the Republican Party, the deflation immediately proceeded with the terrible results described in the bulletin now set forth by the Republican National Committee, in which they point out corn fell from $1.53 per bushel to 55 cents per bushel; cattle from $14.57 to $8.09; wheat from $2.80 to $1.43; hogs from $15.88 to $9.66; wool from 90 to 54 cents; and cotton from 39 to 14 cents—Chicago prices. The dollar worshiped by the patrons of the Republican Party doubled in purchasing power and millions of men were ruined.

The official records of the Agricultural Department show that the property of the farmers and stock men was appraised at $79,000,000,000 in 1920 and immediately fell to $58,500,000,000, a net loss of $20,500,000,000 to the farmers and stockmen of the country from which they have never recovered, and the last depression is even far worse than the first.

It is no wonder that the Republican National Committee should now attempt to fasten upon the Democratic Party the responsibility of the deflation of 1920–21, but the attitude of the Democratic Party upon this question is not left to conjecture. It is written in their platform of 1924, a plank which I had the honor to draft, as follows, to wit:

"REPUBLICAN CONTRACTION OF CREDIT AND CURRENCY

"We denounce the recent cruel and unjust contraction of legitimate and necessary credit and currency, which was directly due to the so-called deflation policy of the Republican Party as declared in its national platform of June, 1920, and in the speech of acceptance of its candidate for the Presidency. Within 18 months after the election of 1920 this policy resulted in withdrawing bank loans and discounts by over $5,000,000,000 and in contracting our currency by over $1,500,000,000. This contraction bankrupted hundreds of thousands of farmers and stock growers in America and resulted in widespread industrial depression and unemployment. We demand that the Federal reserve system be so administered as to give stability to industry, commerce, and finance, as was intended by the Democratic Party, which gave the Federal reserve system to the Nation."

THE RESPONSIBILITY OF THE REPUBLICAN PARTY FOR THE PANIC OF 1920–21 AND THE DEPRESSION OF 1929 TO 1932

There can be no possible doubt about the responsibility of the Republican Party for the depression of 1920–21 which bankrupted agriculture and its allied industries in the United States, or about their responsibility for the severity of the depression of 1929 to 1932, inclusive.

As they controlled the Presidency, the Senate, and the House of Representatives, the Republican administration was responsible for the conduct of the Federal Reserve Board and of the Federal reserve banks from 1920 to 1932. The expansion of credit and bank loans during 1927, 1928, and 1929 for speculation in the stock market and in other ways created a dangerous condition which should have been corrected by the power of the Federal reserve system operating through individual member banks and preventing their lending money for known speculative purposes, either on the stock exchange, in real estate, or in the commodity markets.

Instead of pursuing this sound policy and continuing to supply the productive forces of the Nation with abundant credit at reasonable rates, the reserve banks and the Reserve Board, under the management of the Republican administration, pursued a systematic course of contracting credit and currency from 1928 to February, 1932, inclusive, penalizing legitimate business, impairing their earning power, discouraging their efforts, and laying the foundation for a major bear movement which ensued in October, 1929.

On May 27, 1929, being most anxious to protect the country from the severity of a reaction which was at that time threatening and could have been modified, I called the attention of the administration to 10 different ways in which the Reserve Board and the reserve banks were contracting credit and currency and penalizing legitimate business and urged the administration to take steps to safeguard the country against the threatened collapse which ensued five months later. When they started to raise the rates of interest to 6 per cent, by wire and otherwise, I asked to be heard before it was done but was made to feel that my effort to serve was an impertinence, for I did not receive the courtesy of an answer.

I put in the record before the Goldsborough subcommittee on the stabilization bills a copy of the 10 different ways in which the Reserve Board and the reserve banks were contracting credit and currency in the spring of 1929 (pp. 134–135).

Instead of maintaining the currency at the per capita of October, 1920, when it reached $53 per capita, they steadily contracted it, when it should have been raised after 1921 approximately 4 per cent per annum to correspond with the 4 per cent per annum of annual increase in production.

When the collapse of credit took place, October, 1929, on the stock exchange and the subsequent withdrawal of $8,000,000,000 of call brokers' loans, the Reserve Board and the reserve banks took no adequate steps to expand credit and currency and to defeat the threatened depression, but contracted credit and currency until forced by public hoarding to expand the reserve notes in 1931 and made the depression worse.

Now that the Committee on Banking and Currency of the House of Representatives by unanimous vote has approved the stabilization bill, the governor of the Federal Reserve Board comes forward and urges that the stabilization of the purchasing power of the dollar be left to him and the Federal Reserve Board and pleads that by expanding credit the evils of the industrial depression can be abated and corrected by the Reserve Board and the reserve banks.

This argument is a confession that they could have corrected the evils of this depression two years and a half ago by doing what they now say they will do as a remedy. Surely, we are justified in asking the governor of the Federal Reserve Board why, if he has this remedy at hand now, he has not availed himself of it for over two years and a half, and why the reserve banks were contracting credit as recently as January, 1932.

The Federal reserve banks and the Federal Reserve Board under 12 years of Republican administration have not only failed to use the great powers given them to stabilize credit and currency and business prosperity, but they have perverted their powers, caused the panic of 1921, and seriously contributed in 1929–1932 to the most devastating panic and depression ever known, causing losses of over $150,000,000,000 to the American people and a world-wide collapse of business.

The world depression is directly due to American mismanagement. Surely the millions of patriotic Republican citizens who are the innocent victims of unintelligent or unfaithful leadership would not approve such policies if they understood it, and certainly many progressive Republican leaders have deplored or denounced it.

The attempt of the Republican National Committee to put the responsibility of deflation and depression and the terrifying losses which have ensued on the Democratic Party deserves exposure, and I call your attention to the facts for such action as you may deem of value to the country.

Very sincerely yours,

ROBERT L. OWEN.

FREEDOM OF THE PHILLIPPINES

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing an article by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BACON] on the Philippines.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BACON], a former Member of the Insular Affairs Committee:

After only 40 minutes' debate, under a drastic gag rule, a majority of the House of Representatives of the United States on April 4 passed a bill which, if enacted into law by the Senate (over a possible presidential veto), in all likelihood would bring these results:

1. The creation of an independent Philippine nation within eight years.

2. The commercial and perhaps military subjugation of that nation by a great eastern power within a comparatively short period.

3. A bloody rebellion or revolution within the Philippines.

4. The destruction of almost all of the Philippines' marvelous economic progress.

5. The creation of a new disturbing factor in the Far East, vastly increasing the possibilities of war in that sphere.

6. The shrinkage of an important market for the products of the United States, with loss of work for thousands of our people.

7. The weakening of all our relations with the Orient—the most promising field for American commercial expansion in the future.

As this is written it is impossible to say whether the folly embarked upon will be consummated—a folly disastrous alike to the people of the Philippine Islands and the people of the United States. Selfish, short-sighted commercial interests drove the "Philippine independence" bill through the House of Representatives. Only widespread understanding and knowledge here and in the Philippines as to the destructive character of the proposal for separation will prevent truly tragic results.

To many of our people at this time what may happen in the Philippines seems unimportant because of the very remoteness of the islands. Yet the effect of Philippine separation within the next few years would be less work in our cotton mills, our cigarette factories, our steel mills, and in other industries. We should be taking the first backward step in our friendly and mutually profitable intercourse with the eastern half of the world—the nations whose hundreds of millions of people are potential customers for all the surplus products we can produce, beyond our own needs.

True it is that the Philippines are far away from our shores. But it is far from true that these islands of the east and south are unimportant to us and to the other nations of the world. Yet because of their remoteness it is well to recall to our people some basic facts about the archipelago that came to us as the result of our war with Spain and over which we were given complete sovereignty by purchase and by treaty with that nation.

By that treaty we acquired dominion over approximately 7,100 islands, extending north more than 1,000 miles from a point not far above the equator, in the very shadow, one might say, of the great bulk of Asia. The great port of Hong Kong is only 631 miles from Manila, the capital of the Philippines—and Chinese sailing boats can cover the distance in four and a half days. The Japanese port of Nagasaki is only 1,306 miles from Manila. British Borneo, Dutch Sumatra, French Indo-China, and the Malay Peninsula, with all the islands of the East Indies, are "neighbors" in a geographical sense. Our own nearest mainland port, Seattle, is 5,943 nautical miles from Manila, and San Francisco is 6,221. Yet, despite the proximity of Japan and other oriental nations, the trade of the Philippines with the United States in 1929 (the last world-normal year) amounted to approximately $211,000,000, compared with a total for all other countries trading with the Philippine Islands of only $94,000,000.

Here, on these 7,100 islands, with an area of 114,000 square miles, live approximately 13,000,000 people of the Malay, or brown race. The area of the islands is about that of the New England States plus New York State; larger than Belgium, Denmark, Holland, Portugal, and Switzerland combined. About half the islands are forest covered and probably not more than half the arable land is cultivated, although the soil is rich and capable ultimately of supporting a population of 60,000,000. The islands are mountainous and full of mineral wealth—gold, silver, platinum, iron, coal, manganese, and copper.

Certainly the islands are rich enough in natural resources and sparse enough in population to tempt other nations if released by the United States and left unprotected. Less than two days distant by steamer is the most densely populated part of China—a region overcrowded with seething millions, periodically visited by famine and flood, with thousands perishing from starvation. Here is the pressure of overcrowded and vigorous population that well justified Gen. Leonard Wood in saying that under Philippine "independence" the Chinese would soon occupy all the fertile valleys and the Filipinos would be driven to the mountain tops. Nothing seems more certain than that if the Philippines were given so-called "independence" during the next decade, with economic pressure as it is in the Far East, there would be either peaceful or forceful penetration and commercial domination by the Chinese and Japanese, and a loss of the higher standard of living of western civilization. The American population is only about 6,000, and American investments are from $80,000,000 to $145,000,000.

To these far eastern islands, after nearly 350 years of Spanish misrule, the United States brought peace, order, and prosperity within a few years of the termination of the Spanish-American War. Schools were established, roads built, banditry suppressed; cholera, smallpox, and other diseases were virtually banished; and a government was instituted which gave the Philippine people, through their elected representatives, the power to make the laws and to maintain their own constabulary. Practically all administrative offices were filled by Filipinos.

At the head of this government is the Governor General, appointed by the President of the United States; yet even the most rabid Filipino politician makes no assertion that there has been cruelty or oppression under this form of government. The fact is that probably never in the history of the world has more rapid progress been made in educating and economically uplifting a large body of nearly primitive people. This is due not only to the application of American ideals but to the character of the people, who were described by Gen. Leonard Wood, when he was governor of the islands, as "property loving, law abiding, sympathetic, intelligent, hospitable, and neighborly," as well as keenly interested in education.

The progress made in a third of a century has resulted in a government that is self-supporting, so that our own expenditure is largely confined to the Army personnel in the Philippines—approximately $11,500,000 annually. This is an expense that would be part of the National Budget even if this part of our Army were returned to the United States; in other words, the Philippine Islands cost our Government nothing.

Thus we have established in the Far East an outpost of western civilization, with a population that will in time be almost entirely English speaking, due to the necessity of a common language. There is no one native tongue, but as many as 87 languages and dialects. In a total population of about 13,000,000, there are 1,300,000 children in school learning the English language. Probably nine-tenths of the people are Christians, but the minority represent a problem that I shall mention later.

I have recited these facts, about which there can be no controversy, that there may be a clear understanding by all as to what we are dealing with when we legislate on the fate of the islands—and our own fate as a world power.

One other essential fact remains to be stated: Under the Washington conference treaties with other great naval powers, by which armaments were limited, we agreed not to strengthen our defenses in the Philippines. We thereby put a stop to vast competitive expenditures for war purposes in the Far East. We also agreed to maintain the status quo in the Far East, and by giving up the Philippines we would be violating the spirit of the Washington treaties.

Now it remains to consider what happens if the Philippines are given "independence"—in practical effect, set adrift—in 8 or 10 years.

In the first place there probably would be sanguinary conflict in the islands, for one-third of the area is possessed by approximately a million Moros, occupying what is known as the Mahometan territory. These people were never subdued by Spain; they are not likely to be subdued by the Filipinos of the Christian island provinces. They are essentially different. Their faith is that of Islam. Their spoken language descends from the Arabian, with only a small mixture of Malayan words. Their written language shows a mingling of Sanskrit and Indian Arabic. They recognize the Sultan of Sulu and various other native chiefs, or datus, as they are called. There have been bloody conflicts in the past between the Mahometan Moros of the south and the Christian Filipinos in the northern islands. We disarmed the Moros and put weapons in the hands of the Filipino constabulary, so that they are able to exercise a semblance of authority. But take away the restraining hand of the United States, backed by wisdom and consideration in dealing with the proud Moro segment, and what happens when the Philippines attain independence? I think the best answer to that question is contained in this excerpt from a Moro petition submitted to Congress:

"Therefore we, in representation of nearly 500,000 Mahometan residents of Mindanao and Sulu, do solemnly affirm and declare:

"That we are loyal unto death to the United States.

"That in proof of this loyalty we have pledged ourselves, by the most solemn oath known to Mahometans, to die rather than submit to domination by Christian Filipinos from the north, and, if necessary, to die in order that the United States Congress, which heretofore has lent a deaf ear to our petitions, may now hear us."

And much more to the same effect, only in even stronger terms!

Remembering the long struggle of Ireland against England, remembering the hatreds and wars bred in Europe by forced allegiances of racial minorities, remembering the savage, bloody, long-sustained religious wars in the Orient, we may anticipate never-ending rebellion in the Moro Provinces if Philippine independence and sovereignty are now proclaimed. And remembering, too, the vast numbers of Mahometans in the territory adjacent to the Philippines, the conclusion is inescapable that a religious war of wide extent may again be precipitated in the Far East, disastrous to every great nation.

To understand the economic disaster that will be inflicted upon the Filipino people by separation from the United States one must know something of the forces which were aligned to secure passage of the "independence" bill through the House of Representatives.

Openly and covertly advocating separation of the Philippines and the United States were the paid lobbyists of Cuban and American sugar interests, who want to keep Philippine sugar out of this country by tariff barriers when "independence" becomes effective; and the lobbyists of dairy, cottonseed oil, and tobacco interests, who want to bar by import duties Philippine coconut oil (used mainly in making soaps and, to a small degree, margarine substitutes for butter) and Philippine cigars and tobacco.

We produce here only 1 pound of sugar out of every 5 pounds consumed by our people, so that to exclude Philippine sugar would be of the greatest benefit to Cuba.

The intended effect, of course, of limiting our importation of Philippine coconut oil is to increase the market and raise the price for domestically produced cottonseed oil, at the ultimate expense of the consumers of soap, for cottonseed oil will not make soap. The only result will be that the American people will have to pay more.

Now, assuming that these selfish objects are accomplished by the grant of independence and the imposition of tariffs against Philippine products for the benefit of limited classes in this country, what is the general effect?

Easily answered: First, the practical destruction of the means of livelihood of several million people in the Philippine Islands; the ruination of the banking systems of the islands, which have made loans for sugar and coconut oil and copra and tobacco production; and, last, but not least, probably rebellion by native workers who will be reduced to the low economic status of other struggling, suffering populations of the Far East.

These will be the direct effects in the Philippines. But we ourselves shall be punished and penalized, directly and heavily, for our act of hypocrisy in advancing certain special, selfish interests under the guise of liberation of a people already free for all practical intents and purposes.

We shall lose, first of all, the immense latent resources of the Philippines, such as its 486,000,000,000 board feet of commercial timber, largely rare hardwoods, not produced in the United States, and the islands' capacity for rubber production.

We shall lose a market—the largest we have in the world—for our cotton piece goods; for, of course, an independent Philippine nation would cancel the preferential tariff which now gives us the advantage in selling our cloth, the product of American mills, in the islands. The Philippine cotton goods trade keeps more than 250,000 acres of American farm lands and nearly 6,000 American mill hands busy.

With most of the purchasing power of the Philippines destroyed by an "independence" that will close our doors to the island products, Philippine demand—or ability to pay—for many other American products will terminate. In 1908 our exports to the Philippines amounted to only $5,000,000. By 1929 they had mounted to $85,000,000—enough money to keep scores of thousands of American workers busy producing goods for shipment across the Pacific; and the means of support of thousands of dependent women and children. In the 21 years from 1908 to 1929 our exports to the Philippine Islands increased 1,600 per cent, while our purchases from them advanced 1,045 per cent. Meantime, their purchases from foreign countries increased only 130 per cent; so that we had by far the greater share in this market of 12,000,000 people.

Consider the human factor again, in the slump of American exports to the Philippines that would surely follow separation. The millions of dollars' worth of iron and steel goods that we ship to the islands, even in a "low" year, represent the labor of more than 4,500 American workmen. Philippine importers are confident that the withdrawal of free trade would cost American exporters more than three-fourths of their present trade in iron and steel with the islands.

Despite the comparative proximity of the East Indies oil fields, and because of a protective tariff in our favor, we shipped to the Philippines in 1929 nearly 2,000,000 barrels of gasoline, lubricating oil, and similar products. We would lose practically all of this business with separation in effect.

The same year we sent to the Philippines and were paid for 114,340 automobile tires and 1,503,000 pairs of rubber footwear. We sold no fewer than 1,122,000,000 American cigarettes; 6,800 American automobiles, trucks, and busses; 32,000 sewing machines.

Although the Filipinos are a rice-eating people, their consumption of wheat flour has increased nearly fourfold since the establishment of free trade with the United States. Separation of the islands and this Nation politically is largely for the benefit of American sugar interests and cottonseed-oil producers. But with reduced purchasing power the islands will no longer be able to buy most of the flour, the production of which required the cultivation of more than 200,000 acres of wheatland in the United States. The Philippines in a normal year are among the six best markets for United States wheat products. Australia is nearer and its wheat and flour may be expected to capture the market after separation.

The Philippine people under American influence have become milk consumers to a greater degree than any other group of tropical people. Their lands are not suitable for dairy cattle—and so for several years they have been the largest market, on a dollars and cents basis, for condensed and evaporated milk produced in the United States. Philippine imports average a third of the total American exports of canned milks.

I might continue this itemization indefinitely to show the importance of the Philippine market from the standpoint of our workers and their employers. But I have said enough to demonstrate that the separation will bring about disruption and destruction of a trade of more than $200,000,000 annually (on the basis of 1929 exports and imports), with consequent loss of employment both in the Philippines and in our own country.

The Philippines, of course, are of some value as a naval base for the protection of our commerce with the Far East. But they are of the utmost importance as a commercial base for our peaceful entry with merchandise into the Orient. Too many of our people labor under the misapprehension that the Orient is dormant and means nothing to us. The fact is that the hope of the western world lies in the reawakening of the East, with an increase in the wants and buying power of its hundreds of millions of people.

That awakening can be achieved only by the expansion of trading between east and west. In the Philippines we already have a wonderfully fine commercial gateway to the Orient, with shipping facilities, a transshipment point, banking interests and resources.

Now it is proposed to cast off this outpost of American civilization and base for American trade with half the world—not for the real benefit of the Filipino people but to serve certain special interests in this country. We are choosing the worst possible time, from the standpoint of safety of the Filipino people and the safety of our own interests.

We are preparing to give other nations vitally interested in the Orient something else in the way of territory and resources to quarrel over, to covet, and to become the subject of international intrigue. We disturb naval relations and we lose power to protect our commerce in the East.

Such is the havoc that will be wrought if the "Philippine independence" bill becomes law. We could do no greater injury to the Filipino people than by this means. We do injury to our own people, employed in factory and on farm, if the bill becomes law. And by such legislation we would add one more point of disturbance and possible strife to a world that is trying to find the way to a lasting peace. No greater folly has been proposed since this country reached its majority in the family of nations.

SENATE

TUESDAY, MAY 10, 1932

(Legislative day of Monday, May 9, 1932)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate will receive a message from the House of Representatives.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed without amendment the following bill and joint resolution of the Senate:

S. 2775. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Masonic Mutual Relief Association of the District of Columbia," approved March 3, 1869, as amended; and

S. J. Res. 50. Joint resolution to authorize the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to close upper Water Street between Twenty-second and Twenty-third Streets.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 27) providing for the correction of an error in the enrollment of Senate bill 3584, relating to insurance corporations in the District of Columbia, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 7305. An act to permit construction, maintenance, and use of certain pipe lines for petroleum and petroleum products; and

H. J. Res. 154. Joint resolution to authorize the merger of street-railway corporations operating in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

MINERAL RESOURCES AS RELATED TO FARM LANDS (S. DOC. NO. 93)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of Agriculture, submitting, pursuant to Senate Resolution No. 377, of the Seventy-first Congress, a report pertaining to the mineral resources of the country as related to farm lands, prepared in the Bureau of Agricultural Economics of the department, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed with an illustration.

DISPOSITION OF USELESS PAPERS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Assistant Secretary of Labor, transmitting, pursuant to law, a list of papers and documents on the files of the Bureau of Labor Statistics and the Children's Bureau, which are not needed in the conduct of business and possess no historical interest, and asking for action looking to their disposition, which was referred to a Joint Select Committee on the Disposition of Useless Papers in the Executive Departments.

The VICE PRESIDENT appointed Mr. METCALF and Mr. COPELAND members of the committee on the part of the Senate.

AMENDMENT OF REVENUE BILL—TAX ON BEER

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to introduce at this time an amendment to the revenue bill, which I ask to have printed and lie on the table. The amendment is a little difficult to understand because of some of the blind references to figures in it. I may say in explanation of it that it provides for the elimination of a number of nuisance taxes and the substitution therefor of a tax on beer in order to provide the necessary revenue.

As a matter of fact, the present revenue laws now on the statute books provide for a tax of $6 a barrel on beer. Therefore all that would be necessary to be done in order to take advantage of this tax would be to amend the Volstead Act by striking out the words "one-half of 1 per cent" wherever they appear in such act and insert in lieu thereof the words "4 per cent."

A conservative estimate of the amount of revenue which could easily be raised by this change is $375,000,000. Some persons estimate it to be as high as $500,000,000. Adopting the more conservative figure, it would provide sufficient revenue to meet the elimination of the taxes in the new bill which I propose to strike out. The amendment provides for eliminating all postal increases, including the 3-cent charge on first-class mail matter and the increases in second-class mail matter, the estimated returns from which amount to $160,000,000. I also propose to strike out the tax on admissions to movie theaters and other forms of entertainment, which are calculated to raise $110,000,000. The amendment provides for an elimination of the tax on telegrams and telephones, which is calculated to raise $24,000,000. It eliminates the tax on radios and phonographs, a loss of $11,000,000. A reduction is proposed in the tax on automobiles, putting the tax back to the House figure of 3–2–1 in lieu of the increase substituted by the Senate committee, amounting to $17,000,000. The amendment proposes to reduce the normal income-tax rates from the 3–6–9 rates as proposed in the Senate bill to the House rates of 2–4–7, a reduction of $29,000,000; and also to reduce the tax on lubricating oil from 4 cents to 2 cents a gallon, a loss of $22,000,000.

In short, the amendment would strike from the bill revenue-producing features totaling $373,000,000. By eliminating increased postage rates, increased taxes on admissions, new taxes on telephones and telegrams, new taxes on radios and phonographs, reducing increases in normal income-tax rates, reducing the tax on automobiles and on lubricating oil, and substituting therefor the legalizing of the manufacture and sale of good, wholesome beer, it is conservatively estimated to raise $375,000,000, or $2,000,000 more than the estimates for all the eliminated items. This is in line with the recommendations of the majority of the subcommittee which held hearings on the beer bills.

The amendment would not only eliminate the worst of the nuisance taxes but would immediately restore work to hundreds of thousands of unemployed and provide a new market for grain, coal, transportation, and numerous other articles for which there is now no demand.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

ACTION IN THE ECONOMIC SITUATION

Mr. BARBOUR presented a telegram from the Manufacturers' Association of New Jersey, signed by J. Philip Bird, its president, embodying a resolution adopted by that organization, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ATLANTIC CITY, N. J., May 7, 1932.

Hon. W. WARREN BARBOUR,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

The following resolution was unanimously adopted this morning:

"Be it resolved by the Manufacturers Association of New Jersey, in convention assembled, That they greet with thankfulness and elation the nonpartisan effort and leadership of the President of the United States to bring to an end the petty posturing of special groups and individuals seeking their own personal agrandizement at the cost of the continued suffering of the people of this country in this time of business depression and unemployment; that this association, constituted of over 3,900 members, whose employees number even in these times more than 460,000, and constitute 85 per cent of the manufacturing industries of the State of New Jersey, pledge their whole-hearted support of the President in this nonpartisan action looking to a prompt and financially sound solution of the problems of governmental revenue and expenditure. The members of this association have been thoroughly disgusted with the inefficiency, selfishness, and lack of even ordinary common sense exhibited by certain elements of the Government of the United States, and this association demands that the nonpartisan leadership of the President be accepted without question, that the political posturing by groups in Congress cease, and that constructive action be taken without fear or favor for the interests of this Nation as a whole and not for the interest of any class or party or faction, no matter how vociferous or unreasonable. The members of this organization have reached the limit of patience. They refuse to see employees standing idle waiting for work and kept in that condition while a few men and groups in this country disport themselves at the expense of the suffering of the idle. This association further

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution be immediately telegraphed to the President of the United States and to each Member from New Jersey of the Congress of the United States in order that there shall be no lingering doubt in the mind of anyone as to the attitude of this association and of its members and of their demand for immediate action."

TAX ON AUTOMOBILES AND TRUCKS

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, the considered business judgment of leaders in industry can not be ignored by the Senate in respect to the results of prospective new taxation. Even under the pressure of need to complete the tax bill in the shortest possible time we dare not neglect frank study of the economic effects of our tax action. The Senate committee's report not only retains but increases the special and discriminatory levies upon automobiles, trucks, and parts. I shall discuss this matter in detail when the tax bill is before us. It can not be pushed through without full hearings. The implications are too serious. The livelihood of 4,000,000 men is involved. At this immediate moment I am simply warning the Senate that these motor taxes, in the view of experienced men who know whereof they speak, are calculated to stunt employment and thus increase rather than diminish the national emergency. I content myself to-day with a request that there be printed in the RECORD a telegram filed yesterday with the Finance Committee by eight American business executives, whose judgment can not be ignored in perfecting rational and safe tax legislation.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

News that the Finance Committee has voted heavy taxes against automobiles, trucks, parts, accessories, and rubber is a distinct shock to those in the automobile business in every State. Coming at this time, when practically all of us in the automotive business are operating at a loss, this burden placed upon our industry and its users is certain to make itself felt in increased unemployment and additional hardships upon the 4,000,000 workers dependent upon the automotive trade. Such a heavy portion of the new tax bill should not be at the expense of the revival of the largest business in this country. As representatives of our industry we urge you to reconsider the piling up of burdens upon the automotive and all its related business and to give us a chance to bring back employment everywhere.

CREDIT EXPANSION BY USE OF TRADE ACCEPTANCES

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, the chairman of the Westinghouse Electric & Manufacturing Co., Mr. A. W. Robertson, made an interesting suggestion in a recent address before the University of Pittsburgh bearing upon commercial credit expansion through the use of trade acceptances. From such a source, the suggestion is worthy of serious attention. Its importance lies in the fact that it is addressed to ways and means and methods within complete control of business itself and in no degree dependent upon governmental action. After pointing out that our annual national income has been cut in half, although the total cost of government up and down the country remains almost static, and although interest charges are just as heavy upon the debtor as ever, and after commenting that this means 45 per cent of the national income instead of 20 per cent is consumed in these fixed charges, Mr. Robertson goes ahead with the suggestions, which deserve attention. I ask that his subsequent comments be published in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

There being no objection, the matter was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Intelligent students of the problem and people whose judgment I respect and trust all agree that there are two ways out of the mess we are in.

The first is to follow along the bankruptcy road on which we are going and foreclose every mortgage and wipe out enough of the debts by bankruptcy and default to bring them down to some unknown level and start afresh from there. This would mean frightful losses. Following such a course, we could not expect to return to the prosperity of the past for a long time.

The other road is a happier one. It is to bring our income back to the $90,000,000,000 level, where it was when we started to deflate everything and everyone except governmental expenses and debts. These two items now take approximately 45 per cent of all we make. Double our income and these items will take less than one-fourth of our income, which will still be too much of it. This would avoid foreclosures and receivership and would make possible the orderly discharge of our obligations. Our incomes can be increased by increasing the price level, which can be done by increasing the amount of monetary exchange or credit available for business. The supply of monetary exchange or credit has dropped to two-thirds of what it was in 1929. It can be brought back to what it was and without danger. In addition to what can be done through the operations of the Federal reserve system—and you are doubtless aware of the new open-market policy of the Federal Reserve Board, under which the system is buying Government securities at the rate of about $100,000,000 a week, thereby forcing money on the banks and driving the yield on Government securities down to such unattractive levels that banks will eventually be forced to seek other investment channels or opportunities for commercial lending—in addition to this, I say, the supply of credit can be increased by the use of trade acceptances in ordinary productive, commercial transactions; i. e., to pay our current bills for goods purchased for resale or materials bought for manufacture by accepting 90-day drafts, which can be discounted at commercial banks and rediscounted, where necessary, at a Federal reserve bank, thus affording commercial paper collateral for Federal reserve note issue. It has been done before and is always done in good times, and if done now would help materially to improve conditions and stimulate business generally. This practice can do no harm and can not in any sense be called fiat-money inflation. It would simply help to restore the price level and the normal relation between income and debt burden. The stimulation due to this increase in credit would not perform a miracle, but it would go far toward reviving business and restoring prosperity.

CREDIT EXPANSION—ARTICLE BY CLARENCE POE

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I desire to have inserted in the RECORD an article by Clarence Poe, president of the Progressive Farmer-Ruralist Co., dealing with the question of credits. Without approving the remedies suggested in full, the article is worthy of careful consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, leave is granted.

The article is as follows:

[From the Progressive Farmer-Ruralist, May 1–14, 1932]

THE FIGHT FOR "HONEST MONEY" NOW FEATURES THE WORLD'S NEWS

(By Clarence Poe, president the Progressive Farmer-Ruralist Co.)

If the average well-informed American citizen could speak to our average Senator or Representative in Washington, we believe he would say something like this:

"The plain people of America are pleased with the seriousness with which you are going about your work.

"You did well in passing the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act.

"You did well in passing the Glass-Steagall Currency Expansion Act.

"You did well in killing the sales tax and substituting higher income and inheritance taxes, etc.

"You are doing well in promoting governmental economy.

"You will render all America a magnificent service if you pass the proposed plan for guaranteeing bank deposits.

"Yet no one of these things, nor all of them combined, can restore prosperity until you provide for two other things:

"1. Either so increase prices of cotton, wheat, tobacco, and other commodities or so deflate the dollar that our colossal debt burden can be paid off with dollars of the same value that dollars possessed when these debts were created, and

"2. Provide for a genuinely stable system of money from now on."

Since this issue will definitely present itself to Congress this month, we wish briefly to review the outstanding facts involved.

I. HOW DEFLATION HAS DOUBLED FARM DEBTS

Every Congressman and Senator knows how tremendously all forms of debt have increased in the last 15 years—Federal debts, State, county, municipal, and private debts; debts to commercial banks, land banks, mortgage companies, and all financial institutions. And all these debts, public and private, have practically doubled because of the increased value of money. As National Master L. J. Taber of the National Grange has pointed out, if a farmer made a debt so recently as 1930 it now takes 77 per cent more farm products to pay the principal of the debt than then; and Mr. Taber has compiled the following table showing in terms of what the farmer has to sell, just how much he now has to pay in the form of farm products for each $100 borrowed (or each $100 of debt incurred) in any of the years indicated in the table—in principal alone besides increased interest:

Year $100 borrowed:	Present amount
1929	202
1928	208
1927	209
1926	196
1925	217
1924	215
1923	200
1922	197
1921	180
1920	230
1919	333
1918	308
1917	291

There can be no economic recovery that ignores this fundamental situation. As James C. Stone, of the Federal Farm Board, said recently:

"The fellow who is in debt and whose debt was created when commodity values were much higher than now has only three ways to get out. He can repudiate his debt because he can not hope to pay it when the commodity upon which he based the debt was then selling it for four times what it is now. For example, if a cotton grower borrowed money on his land when cotton was 25 cents a pound, it now takes five bales to pay the debt where it took only one when the debt was created—and it is impossible for him to produce five bales where he produced one then. The second way out for the farmer is for the price of the commodity to rise within a reasonable distance of where it was when that debt was created. The third alternative is in some way to provide cheaper money for him to pay his obligation. One of these three things is going to happen. We are going through the repudiation stage now and have been for several years. If that continues, it will be a long-drawn-out process and it will keep business and finances upset. A great many people think that is the natural normal way for it to adjust itself, but personally I do not. One of the other ways should be adopted, and I do not believe it will be necessary for us to go off the gold standard to do it."

II. BUSINESS MEN SUFFER EQUALLY WITH FARMERS

And not only is it impossible for agriculture to recover without either increased commodity prices or deflated debts, but the same thing is true of all business. From no farm leader, from no spokesman of agrarian opinion, has Congress had any warning more emphatic or clear-cut than this voiced by the ablest organ of American business, the Business Week, of New York City:

"The only remaining road to recovery for ourselves and the world is by concerted and courageous action, through governments and central banks, to raise the commodity price level and reduce the value of gold to the level at which it was when the bulk of the world's public and private debt burdens were contracted. Otherwise universal bankruptcy, default, and repudiation are unavoidable."

III. THE FUNDAMENTAL DISHONESTY AND IMMORALITY OF OUR PRESENT MONEY SYSTEM

If "universal bankruptcy, default, and repudiation" were necessary as a result of following rigid rules of honesty and fair dealing, that would be one thing. But when all this disaster is the result rather of a fundamentally immoral and dishonest standard of values (or absence of standards), the situation becomes entirely different. When we reflect that all debts must really be paid in commodities, and when we find the financial committee of the League of Nations reporting that whereas in 1928 it took 100 units of commodities to pay a debt of 100 gold units, to-day it requires 170 units of commodities, we must agree that this is not only "the crux of the crisis," but presents a ghastly and flagrant perversion of essential morality. As C. V. Gregory says: "If Congress had passed a law in 1926 requiring every debtor to pay back $1.50 for every $1 he had borrowed, besides interest, we would have had a revolution. Yet that is what deflation has done. Suppose Congress had passed a law in 1926 doubling the size of the bushel basket or the number of pounds in a bushel, and had told us that in measuring our products to pay our debts, we must give the same number of bushels of grain, but measure it out in these new and enlarged bushel baskets! By failing to take action to stabilize the value of money, Congress has done what amounts to the same thing."

When such conditions prevail and when a man may pay and pay on the principal of a debt and still find himself owing the creditor more in goods and commodity values than at first, then the Government is simply permitting robbery under the sanction of law. As Dr. Irving Fisher, of Yale University, said in substance before a Congressional committee recently:

"Not only are we having a tragic liquidation of debts through foreclosures, etc., but it is a liquidation that does not liquidate. You may pay $300 on a $1,000 debt, only to find that you have increased your indebtedness to $1,100 in terms of commodities. So in spite of all that America has paid on its debts there has been no real liquidation since 1929. We are now in debt more than we were then in terms of what we have to pay with. We are told that the national debt has been reduced by 28 per cent, but that is an illusion. The remainder must be paid by taxes paid by the farmer and factory, in commodities. Instead of our debt being reduced from twenty-five billions to nineteen billions, it now stands at thirty-five billions in market-basket dollars—ten billions more than it was in 1924. Of America's gross debt we have liquidated fifty billions of two hundred billions indebtedness, but now find ourselves with a debt of two hundred and thirty billions in market-basket dollars. Some think that we are working our way out but we are working ourselves in."

IV. WHAT CAN CONGRESS DO ABOUT THE SITUATION?

If the commodity price level of 1920–1930 can be restored and thereafter steadily maintained wholly by Federal reserve action, good and well. But millions believe that it is going to be necessary to provide that hereafter the quantity of gold in our standard dollar shall be increased or decreased so as to equal the average 1920–1930 purchasing power of a dollar. This could be done by storing gold bullion in the United States Treasury and issuing not coin but certificates against it—just as is now done with our silver certificates.

After the tragic experiences America has just been through, all enterprises will lag, all business will halt, all enterprise will be frightened, all development will be checked if every man on the farms and in business must make future plans with no assurance as to whether the dollar at pay time will be worth 50 cents, $1, $1.50, or $2 in commodity values. On the contrary, if as a result of this depression Congress will for all future time provide two such measures as are now under consideration—(1) Government guaranty of bank deposits and (2) a stable currency system based on average 1920–1930 commodity prices—then both American agriculture and American business can at once go forward to an assured and permanent prosperity.

PRESENTATION OF BUST OF GEORGE WASHINGTON TO ARIZONA

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I ask leave to print in the RECORD the dedicatory address of Hon. C. O. Case, superintendent of public instruction of Arizona, and the response thereto of Gov. George W. P. Hunt upon the presentation to the State of Arizona of a bust of General Washington by the United States Commission for the Celebration of the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington, on April 30 last.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The addresses are as follows:

ADDRESS OF C. O. CASE, SUPERINTENDENT OF PUBLIC INSTRUCTION FOR ARIZONA

Firesides endangered, human rights imperiled—the intensity of intangibles—stir armies to victory.

In the Revolutionary War, Americans, inadequately armed, suffered from want of food and clothing; but, fighting for a principle, surprised and captured the hired Hessians, who, with nothing to fight for, were celebrating their pay day in a night of drunken debauch.

Washington, trained only in the military tactics of the frontier, was "first in war" because he shared preeminently with the men he led their faith in that for which they fought, their dauntless courage, their deathless dream of right, triumphant.

Washington, also "first in peace," in the discharge of civic duty, was the leader of men whose ideals have made this Nation great.

Leading the armies that won America independence, presiding in the convention that adopted the Federal Constitution, serving as first President of the United States, retired, a private citizen at Mount Vernon, Washington was ever "first in the hearts of his countrymen." Enshrined, he will always hold that place in our hearts.

We have reached a new historic milestone, the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington. In celebrating this anniversary we celebrate the birth of new ideals in government, rekindle the camp fires of Valley Forge, renew acquaintance with the best and most enduring in the Republic that Washington helped to establish.

The present is the past. The living present is such part of the past as is kept alive by appreciation and proper recognition. Personalities like that of Washington live, participating potentially in public life if a nation in its attitude will permit them. When national indifference to them prevails and appreciation becomes dormant or stinted, national decline has begun.

Down the centuries, establishing monarchies, obliterating republics, with the stride of a giant, came the force of an idea, decreeing with despotic favoritism, that a few should be kings and the rest slaves. It was a fatal day for that idea when Washington was born, for coincident with his birth there came to the hearts of the pioneers of America the resolute conviction that "all men are created equal" under the law.

Two hundred years have passed. The faith of the common people has become the "divinity that shapes" the ends of government, establishing republics, obliterating monarchies.

On the 30th day of April, 143 years ago, with the beauty of a new-born flag, floating in pride and confidence above him, George Washington took the oath of office as first President of the United States. That flag still floats, exultant with hope, and the unfailing integrity with which that first inaugural pledge was kept pleads to-day at the bar of public sentiment that popular government may never permit the American colors to be pulled down and disgraced by the disloyal hands of broken promises.

In celebrating the bicentennial of the birth of Washington we are honoring a name that is now immortal. We are renewing a promise that those principles in our government that are worthy of immortality will be perpetuated.

Governor Hunt, the United States Commission for the Celebration of the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington is, with splendid patriotism and cooperation, presenting to you, our governor, for the State of Arizona, a bust of Washington. This gift and its acceptance are a manifestation, timely and appropriate, of understanding and harmony between State and Federal Governments.

I have been appointed by the United States Commission to act as its representative in presenting to your excellency this patriotic memorial, an expression of the desire of our State and Nation to honor and cherish the memory of Washington.

REMARKS OF GOV. GEORGE W. P. HUNT, OF ARIZONA, ON THE OCCASION OF THE PRESENTATION TO THE STATE OF ARIZONA BY THE NATIONAL BICENTENNIAL COMMISSION OF A BUST OF GEORGE WASHINGTON ON APRIL 30, 1932

To me Washington's career is an inspiration because of his courage and fortitude. Perhaps Washington was not as brilliant as Hamilton, as humane as Jefferson, or as versatile as Franklin, but he was preeminently brave. Morally and physically he had the supreme courage of his convictions, and I believe courage to be the first requisite of a public servant.

His eight years in the Presidency might have been equally well served by others had they possessed the confidence needed by the people in the head of a new government, but his seven years' struggle for independence made him immortal.

He knew that a quibbling Congress was delaying needful action; that the wealthy and prominent colonists were Tory and considered him not only a traitor to his King but to his class and associates; that more Americans were frequently enlisted in the British service than under his flag; that jealous underofficers were engaged in a Conway cabal to supplant him in command, but for seven long years he took his punishment and when his opportunity came he was ready for it. He purchased our liberty at a price that insures a high value on independence.

Washington detractors, by making him human, have but raised the eminence to which we, other humans, can aspire. History may forget popular leaders, but it does not permit the valiant champions of unpopular but righteous causes to remain in obscurity.

America is fortunate to have had such a man as her first President, because as long as our children emulate him, this Nation will go forward to a justified perseverance.

AGRICULTURAL SITUATION IN THE WEST

Mr. CAREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD a letter which I have received with reference to the agricultural situation in the West, and from which I have deleted a portion, together with the name of the writer. I feel that the letter contains much valuable information which should be transmitted to the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

DENVER, COLO., May 6, 1932.

Hon. ROBERT D. CAREY,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR CAREY:

* * * * * * *

Since February I have been at meetings of various kinds in the Dakotas, Washington, Idaho, Utah, Wyoming, Colorado, Oklahoma, and New Mexico. I find there is no general western agricultural problem nor sentiment. Thought by the individual farmers or stockmen is largely based on the condition of the market for the commodity in which they are interested.

There is, however, a general trend to be noted in the expressions heard everywhere on the political, economic, and financial questions. Debts created on the former high commodity price levels and the heavy county and State taxes on tangibles are the two principal causes of irritating and depressing mental attitudes by those involved. These are common problems.

As to farm debts, and irrespective of the governmental or other aid for these conditions, I find two plans are slowly crystallizing in the minds of farmers to cast off these burdens. One is for the calling together of a joint meeting of banking and merchant creditors with the farmer debtors in county or possibly larger areas for a frank discussion of the untenable situation. The thing that is in the minds of those proposing this idea is a scaling down of debts made on the former higher price levels. It would mean practically a compromising of the debts on a percentage basis as is frequently done in commercial life by retail or wholesale dealers with their creditors to avoid receivership or bankruptcy. It is predicated on the fact that not only are commodity prices on a much lower basis but the capital structure of practically all business is liquidated to the bone as indicated in quotations on the stock exchanges and the smaller, or lack of, dividends of corporations. Such a reduction in farm assets it is felt must also be recognized.

The second idea that I occasionally hear discussed is more drastic in its action to relieve the farmers' debts. It is to take advantage of the national bankruptcy laws. This has always been repugnant to the agricultural classes although relatively common in commercial business. I would not say that this idea has been encouraged by banking and insurance interests in the big centers but apparently it is not seriously opposed.

He has a first mortgage on the farm. Often a second mortgage secures a local loan. The local banker will hold either a personal or crop-loan note. Three to five machinery people have notes on file. In addition local merchants have open accounts for supplies, prices of which due to credit extended often run 25 to 50 per cent higher than cash prices. One instance I know of is of tractor gasoline billed at 35 cents, when the season's cash price was never over 20 cents.

In cases where discouraged farmers have broached the subject of throwing up their whole business under such handicaps, certain first-mortgage holders have suggested that the bankruptcy act could be taken advantage of; homestead and household exemptions, which can not legally be signed away, could be claimed, and thus they can run on a clean slate for another year. In the meantime the first-mortgage owner would bid in the farm and lease it back to the original owner, the inference being that at a later date he could buy it back on easy terms. (One instance in Idaho I ran into was of two adjoining farms, only fairly well improved, on both of which an insurance company had loans. The latter foreclosed one mortgage of $4,000 and was offering the property at $3,500. The neighbor had a $4,000 loan also, along with a lot of other debts, and was seriously considering throwing up his place and buying in the adjoining land at $500 less than either mortgage.)

The above two plans are not in universal thought among farm debtors as yet, but are in process of development in certain sections. Should they result in action and spread, it would certainly play havoc with local business men and bankers who are listing a lot of this top-heavy debt as assets.

As to agricultural or farming conditions and plans:

Due to relative scarcity of durum and spring wheat last year and very fair prices as a result mainly of drought and grasshoppers, I note a greatly increased intention to plant wheat in the Northwest. There will be a decrease in flax. In many other sections farmers are starting spring work in a disheartened and despondent state of mind. The potato men in the Yakima, Walla Walla, Idaho, Colorado, and Red River sections all are that way, yet they are planting potatoes again. Practically all fruits and vegetables were in oversupply last year, but crops of these are going in everywhere. Onions were the high-priced article of 1931, and farmers are almost universally responding to price and are plunging heavily on them. Seed is almost impossible to obtain, the demand is so great. I saw letters from Kalamazoo, Mich., in New Mexico wanting onion seed or plants. At a conference at Santa Fe, N. Mex., of western men we were told that the estimate is for 300,000 tons of canning peaches in California this year. Last year's canned storage is heavy, and canners will only contract 100,000 tons, so two-thirds of the crop is to be wasted. Numerous other crops are in the same situation.

Here in Colorado and in your State the lack of a minimum price for sugar beets is causing a lot of worry and actual distress among tenants and labor. Yet plantings are going on irrespective of the bad trading position growers will be in this fall in trying to sell to one buyer. They hope "something will turn up" to clarify the sugar situation. In Oklahoma, Texas, and eastern New Mexico cotton is being planted in a half-hearted, discouraged way, as losses were real last year and the heavy carry-over portends a weak situation again. Winter-wheat fields down there generally look bad, but as last year's surplus is still a weight on the market, growers expect only small gross returns for the current crop, although the lighter crop will doubtless aid in reducing the surplus. It will, however, bring little money into the different regions and it is very questionable whether many farmers can stand another light-income year.

Water, either subsoil moisture or snow in the mountains, for irrigation is in good supply in all but a few small areas. From a production point of view prospects haven't been better, in the main, for a number of years.

As to livestock, it has been a bad winter; feed was scarce, as was money to buy it, so lots of stock had a pretty tough time and there were heavy losses.

Except where overwhelmed with debts or with $8 loans, the sheepmen as a class are the most hopeful for the future of any that I have met. They point to the fine distribution of the entire lamb crop last year, even if at low prices. They believe the total number of ewes shown January 1, which included the culls of two years in many flocks, would show a sharp decrease if counted as of June 1, due to winter losses. Around 75 per cent of the ewe lambs of 1930 and over 85 per cent of the ewe lambs of 1931 were sold by owners in order to get money, so it is estimated that average ages of ewe bands have risen over one and one-half years. This will mean enforced replacement or else going out of business in a year or two. Wherever possible to finance operations, I believe you will see a lot of ewe lambs held back this fall. This holding will reduce supplies of market lambs and prices, which, while low, are very buoyant, will rise—it is fondly hoped by sheepmen—and they will be on their feet again. They believe that a market which could absorb the increased number it did the past year in the face of seriously declining purchasing power will respond rather broadly not only to a shorter total lamb crop but to reduced market numbers due to these replacement needs.

The beef-cattle men in general are in the attitude of sailors riding out a storm. There is little husbandry trouble within the industry, their serious price situation being due to restriction in labor demand for a supply of meat of only normal tonnage. Sales at younger age and lighter weight are absorbing more numbers in a given tonnage when compared to 10 years ago. So, although they are at present hard pressed, they are in a good statistical position to take advantage of the if and when of industrial movement.

I am writing you all of this as my personal observations and am not interested in politics. But the latter is cropping out in one or two governmental activities. The main one is in the use of the so-called reconstruction money, or at least that part of it assigned to agricultural aid. I mean in the way it is being considered by recipients. Farmers who even in distress were too proud to accept of the drought, seed, and feed emergency loan appropriations feel that the new funds are political in character and that they might as well get their share of the distribution. They are aided and abetted in this by local business men. "The big corporations, banks, loan and insurance companies, and railroads are getting theirs; this is what was allotted to us so we might as well have it" is the attitude in many instances.

The livestock interests, however, in some sections are arising in wrath at the terms and conditions being forced on them through the operations of the newly set up livestock loan companies to use the reconstruction money. These companies, whose principals are often local bankers, are forcing borrowers to put up 10 per cent of their loan for capital stock in the companies, in most cases as a cushion for bad loans formerly made by the local bankers and over which the conservative borrowing stockmen have no control. Also, it is stated that banks are shoving the loans of customers, as they come due, off onto the loan companies whether the stockmen want to go or not and at additional cost. It is claimed that while the face of the paper shows 7½ per cent interest, actual operations, inspections, deductions, etc., will run the costs to the prohibitive figures of 15 to 18 per cent per annum for actual use of money for around 18 months. The 10 per cent investment required is not to be paid back when the conservative loan is repaid but is held until all loans are liquidated and assumes its share of the loss for irresponsible loans. I saw one actual loan worked out which shows over 17 per cent costs for the money on a fair loan forced out of a local bank.

You may already have heard of some of this discontent with the treatment which stockmen claim they have had; as I understood protests were being drawn up to go either to your body or to the heads of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

This communication is entirely too long. However, you asked me for a report on western conditions which takes in a lot of items.

Yours truly, ——— ———.

INCREASE OF BANKING FACILITIES

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 4412) to provide for the safer and more effective use of the assets of Federal reserve banks and of national banking associations, to regulate interbank control, to prevent the undue diversion of funds into speculative operations, and for other purposes.

Mr. GLASS resumed and concluded the speech begun by him yesterday. The speech follows entire.

Monday, May 9, 1932

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, some time back the Senate unanimously passed a resolution known as Senate Resolution 71, and I now desire to invite the attention of the Senate to the text of it. It resolved that—

> In order to provide for a more effective operation of the national and Federal reserve banking systems of the country, the Committee on Banking and Currency of the Senate or a duly authorized subcommittee thereof be and hereby is empowered and directed to make a complete survey of the systems, and a full compilation of the essential facts and to report the result of its findings as soon as practicable, together with such recommendations for legislation as the committee deems advisable.

I desire to invite particular attention to this sentence of the resolution:

> The inquiry thus authorized and directed is to comprehend specifically the administration of these banking systems and respect to the use of their facilities for trading in and carrying speculative securities, the extent of call loans to brokers by member banks for such purposes, the effect on the system of the formation of investment and security trusts, the desirability of chain banking, the development of branch banking as a part of the national system, together with any related problems which the committee may think it important to investigate.

The resolution was a modification of a more elaborate resolution proposed by the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING].

In obedience to that unanimous action of the Senate, the Committee on Banking and Currency set up a subcommittee of five members with jurisdiction of all the questions propounded in Senate Resolution 71. The subcommittee in January and February of last year instituted extensive hearings on every phase of the banking problem as comprehended in the resolution. The committee brought here banking experts and economists and textbook writers, and heard, in addition to the persons summoned, all responsible bankers or technicians who expressed a desire to be heard. The committee covered the entire field of existing banking, and made a searching inquiry into proposals for modifications of the banking laws.

In addition to these hearings the experts of the committee prepared sweeping interrogations which were sent out to several thousand of the more or less important banking institutions of the country, including, of course, all of the Federal reserve banks and all of the member banks of the Federal reserve system, as well as many of the more important banks outside of the Federal reserve system. The committee thus acquired perhaps the most extensive information on banking problems of any theretofore assembled by any committee of the Congress. These data we searched with the utmost diligence and scrutinized in all their varying phases.

Perhaps it might be somewhat interesting to the Senate in this connection to give a little of the background of the Federal reserve banking system. Before the adoption of that system, as all Senators will recall, we had an utterly inadequate banking system in this country, the national bank currency being based on the bonded indebtedness of the United States, and State banks being precluded from all issue by a prohibitive tax of 10 per cent.

In those days the bonded indebtedness of the United States, somewhat less than $1,000,000,000, measured, with a limited supply of Treasury bills, the entire possible volume of outstanding currency. In time of stress a national bank in any given community could only issue such amount of currency as would measure the volume of its bonds having the circulation privilege impounded with the Comptroller of the Currency in Washington. Although the demands of that community, commercial and industrial, might be for currency aggregating $10,000,000 or more, if the national banks in that given community had impounded with the Comptroller of the Currency only three or five million dollars of United States bonds they could issue only that amount of currency.

Then we had a system of pyramided reserves, the reserve of a bank being, as it were, an index, a thermometer, to the bank itself, as to its patrons, of the solvency of the bank. Under then existing law an interior bank, known as a country bank, might carry a part of its reserve with a bank in a reserve city, and the bank in the reserve city, in turn, might carry a greater proportion of its reserve with a bank in a central reserve city. Thus the reserves of the country were pyramided, and did not furnish an accurate, enlightening index of the solvency of the banking community.

Moreover, under the old system, a practice, not now altogether abandoned, grew up of not only sending these reserves in a pyramided form to the money centers but of sending all the surplus funds of an interior bank to the money centers at a nominal rate of interest, usually about 2 per cent.

I have often said that the banking business of the country was the only business of which I had any knowledge that refused to be governed by the law of supply and demand. In other words, in lax periods, when credit was abundant and currency likewise, few if any of the unit banks would give their industrial and commercial patrons the benefit of that situation. Rather than reduce what they termed their standard rate, whatever it might be—6 per cent in some communities, 7 per cent in others, and as high as 12 per cent in some of the States—rather than "demoralize," as they termed it, their standard rate of interest, they would bundle up their surplus funds and send them to the money centers at a 2 per cent rate; and thus sent to the money centers the banks there must make use of them, for naturally they would not permit them to remain idle drawing the nominal rate of 2 per cent. The use they made of them was "on call." They used the idle funds of the whole banking system of the United States largely for stock speculative purposes on the market.

When business should become active, when credit should become in urgent demand, when local banks must respond actively and at times urgently to the local demands of credit, they in turn would seek to withdraw their reserves and their other deposits from the banks in the money centers. Interest rates on call thereupon would rise and rise and rise, until finally disaster would overtake the entire banking community. The banks in the money centers found themselves unable to respond to the demands of the country banks throughout the Nation.

The country banks then were forced to preclude loans for local commercial and industrial purposes, and as the difficulty thus became accentuated the interior banks found themselves unable to respond to their checking balances and depositors found themselves unable to withdraw their funds on deposit with their local banks. That meant that throughout this Nation wherever there was an institution known as a clearing house the banks in that state of organization would get together and severally and unitedly issue what were known as clearing-house certificates, to be used instead of the ordinary currency. It was an utterly illegal and irregular expedient, but the banks were compelled to resort to it in order to avert a complete breakdown and in order to avert a complete stoppage of business. Thus every decennial we would have what was known as a "financial panic" in the United States. The chief harm was not to the banking community by any means, because by these irregular expedients the banking community protected itself; but the almost irretrievable disaster frequently was to the business interests of the country, to industry, to commerce, to the man behind the plow, to the laborer in the factory, and everywhere.

The last recurrence of a disaster of this kind eventually prompted the Congress of the United States to adopt what is now known as the Federal reserve act. We sought by that legislation to withdraw the reserve trust funds of the country from the money centers, from use in "speculation," as some politely term it, but "stock gambling" as I have no hesitation in describing it, and to impound them in 12 regional banks for commercial and industrial uses and not for stock-speculative uses.

We had hoped that in thus withdrawing the reserve funds and distributing them throughout the country in these regional banks we would set an example that would readily be followed by the country banks. We regarded it as a banking declaration of independence. We undertook to rescue the country bank from involuntary servitude to the great banks in the money centers. But we failed to do that; they are still in involuntary servitude, and right now, as I am receiving telegrams of protest from the money centers against a proposition to have branch banking in the national system, the very bankers who are sending the telegrams know perfectly well that some large banks have as many as 4,000 correspondent banks throughout this country which are in involuntary servitude to them. By granting the correspondent banks privileges and giving them accommodations which they may obtain, if they would obtain them, at their respective Federal reserve banks, the banks in the money centers know that they put them under obligation, so that "advice" from a great bank in a money center usually amounts in the last analysis to coercion; and the country to-day is witnessing the evil results of a system of that sort.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. WATSON. Is not that the very method that was used in order to induce the correspondent banks to take many of these foreign securities?

Mr. GLASS. That is just what I am about to say. The Senator anticipated me.

It was because of that system of involuntary servitude that the great banks in the money centers choked the portfolios of their correspondent banks from Maine to California with utterly worthless investment securities, nearly eight billions of them being the investment securities of tottering South American republics and other foreign countries.

Incidentally, I may remark that the State Department is largely culpable for the extent of these worthless loans. It assumed, without sanction of law and without precedent of any sort, the impossible function of passing upon foreign loans. A little clerk up there, devoid of facilities of examination or of inquiry or of estimation, undertook to say whether a foreign loan was acceptable or unacceptable to this Government, with the result that these foreign investment securities would go into the open market practically with the imprimatur of this Government upon them in competition with sound domestic loans seeking credits for purpose of promoting our commerce and our industrial life.

I say the State Department is largely responsible for its part in promoting credits of this kind; and this notwithstanding the Senate by unanimous vote, without a word of dissent, passed a resolution expressing it as the sense of this body that the State Department should desist from this evil practice. The newspapers the next day announced that the Secretary of State would pay no attention to the expressed conviction of the Senate; and it pursued the lawless practice with just such revelations as we had before the Finance Committee of the Senate.

But to get back to the Federal reserve system, if anything was made plain in the spirit and the text of the act, it was that the Congress intended that the reserve trust funds of the Federal reserve system should never be used for speculative purposes.

Mr. NORRIS. Madam President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mrs. CARAWAY in the chair). Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I desire to ask the Senator if in the investigation of the committee any evidence was adduced that not only the State Department but the Treasury Department had been instrumental to some extent, through its examiners or otherwise, in inducing so-called country banks to make the investments the Senator has mentioned?

Mr. GLASS. I do not know that we took testimony upon that particular point; but I do know that a few days ago my attention was called by a letter from one of the most responsible bankers in Virginia to the fact that an official of the Federal reserve system itself had issued a letter, over his name as an official of a certain Federal reserve bank, promoting an investment stock.

Mr. NORRIS. Madam President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. GLASS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I am induced to ask the question because a great many bankers in my section of the country have told me that that was true. Those who were stockholders in banks that failed mainly on account of investments of this kind have told me likewise that it was almost a common practice for the national-bank examiners to advise the banks to make investments of this kind rather than to loan their money to farmers in the community, where, as they claimed, the loans would lack the liquidity that they otherwise would possess if the banks invested in the stocks and bonds mentioned.

Mr. GLASS. I myself have heard that bank examiners were not at all averse to giving advice not only to banks but to individuals as to how they might, in view of the bank examiner, better invest their funds. I assert, however, that nothing in the Federal reserve act is plainer than the expressed intent of the Congress that no longer should the reserve funds of this country and the accumulated assets of the Federal reserve banks be used for speculative purposes.

Under section 13 of the act it is provided that—

Upon the indorsement of any of its member banks, * * * any Federal reserve bank may discount notes, drafts, and bills of exchange arising—

How? Out of speculative transactions? Never!

Arising out of actual commercial transactions; that is—

In further explanation—

notes, drafts, and bills of exchange issued or drawn for agricultural, industrial, or commercial purposes, or the proceeds of which have been used, or are to be used, for such purposes.

That is what these credits were to be made for; and the act charges the Federal Reserve Board with the exclusive right to determine or define the character of paper thus eligible for discount within the meaning of this act.

There is the affirmative side of the law, stating textually what these credits are to be set up for. There is, however, a negative side of the proposition:

Nothing in this act contained shall be construed to prohibit such notes, drafts, and bills of exchange, secured by staple agricultural products, or other goods, wares, or merchandise from being eligible for such discount, and the notes, drafts, and bills of exchange of factors issued as such making advances exclusively to producers of staple agricultural products in their raw state shall be eligible for such discount.

Thus far, we see, the act provides what may be eligible and only what may be eligible for rediscount at the Federal reserve banks. Then, however, it proceeds a step farther, and puts its negation upon speculative credits:

But such definition—

That is, the definition to be made by the Federal Reserve Board exclusively—

Such definition shall not include notes, drafts, or bills covering merely investments or issued or drawn for the purpose of carrying or trading in stocks, bonds, or other investment securities, except bonds and notes of the Government of the United States.

I can not conceive that anything in a Federal statute could be made plainer than the intent of Congress to provide against the use of Federal reserve facilities, directly or indirectly, in stock-market speculative operations. So Senate Resolution 71 charged your Banking and Currency Committee particularly to investigate that aspect of the question, and to ascertain to what extent, if any, the Federal reserve banking facilities had been used for these speculative purposes. Thus, at the very outset, this bill, S. 4412, undertakes to deal with that question.

FEDERAL RESERVE SYSTEM TRANSFORMED

Not only has the Federal reserve banking system been used in an inordinate measure in stock-market transactions but there appears to have been an extraordinary misconception by the administrators of the act of its real purpose. In large degree the system has been transformed into an investment banking system, whereas the fixed purpose of Congress was to set up a commercial banking system and to preclude speculative operations. Your committee was even informed in writing recently that one of our assumptions embodied in a certain provision of the bill would be sound, would be feasible, based upon the supposition that member banks of the Federal reserve system rediscounted with the Federal reserve bank for the purpose of relending the funds thus secured. What else, I may ask, was ever designed than that process? The whole purpose of the act was to enable a member bank of the system, when it should have depleted its own liquid and ready resources in responding to the requirements of commerce and agriculture and industry, to take its eligible paper to its Federal reserve bank and get additional funds. And for what purpose? To respond further to the demands of commerce and industry. That is what was meant by the rediscount operation of the Federal reserve banking system.

Yet we are quietly told that that is not the process any longer; that the administrators of the law know perfectly well what the intent of Congress was, but that "the evolution of banking" activities has been such that no longer is that done to any considerable extent.

Let me tell Senators the meaning, and, in the last analysis, the result of that sort of administration of the law. It means that a member bank may engage in any sort of speculative business it may please, and then, when its reserve in the Federal reserve bank is impaired, it may take its eligible paper for rediscount and use the credit and the currency thus afforded to reestablish its reserve, and not to relend for "commercial, industrial, or agricultural purposes."

That is an evasion of the intent, the spirit, and text of the Federal reserve banking act. It never was intended that its facilities should be used for investment purposes, or for speculative purposes, in that roundabout way.

OPEN-MARKET OPERATIONS

We had an open-market provision in the Federal reserve bill. One has only to read the report made in 1913 to the House of Representatives on the bill as it passed and became a law to understand what the open-market provision of the bill was intended for.

It was intended for two purposes only: To enable the Federal reserve bank to enforce its discount rate against the acquisitiveness and greed of any member bank in its region, an authority somewhat akin to the practice of the Bank of England.

The other design of the open-market provision was to enable the Federal reserve bank to use its idle funds, not in a speculative venture, but to use its idle funds in a reasonably profitable way in order to cover its overhead, in order to pay its expenses.

I find that the average person, if not the average Congressman, is laboring under the hallucination that the expenses of the Federal reserve bank system are borne by the United States Government, and the Economy Committee at the other end of the Capitol actually proposes to "economize Government expenses" by cutting down the salaries of the members of the Federal Reserve Board, whereas the Government of the United States never spent a 10-cent piece toward the expenses of the Federal reserve banking system, never paid the salary of a janitor. The expenses of the system are paid by assessments upon the member banks; and how on earth we may "economize Government expenditures" by cutting down the salaries of the Federal Reserve Board I am unable to understand.

I have indicated what were the two purposes of the open-market provision of the reserve act, vehemently opposed by the large banks in the money centers, because, they said, it would bring the Federal reserve bank into competition with them in their ordinary business transactions.

What has happened? The rediscount feature of the system has practically been submerged by the open-market transactions in the large money centers, somewhat speculative, altogether of an investment nature, totally, I contend, unrelated to what were intended to be the normal operations of this great banking system.

For a period of six years one of the Federal reserve banks has apparently given more attention to "stabilizing" Europe and to making enormous loans to European institutions than it has given to stabilizing America. Accordingly, we have a provision in this bill asserting, in somewhat plainer terms, the restraint the Federal reserve supervisory authority here at Washington should exercise over the foreign and open market operations of banks which may assume to be a "central bank of America."

We did not think that we were having a central bank. We thought we were having 12 regional banks. The operations of the bank particularly referred to were so extensive in the European field that it found itself liable for hundreds of millions of dollars of foreign acceptances which could not be collected, which had to be renewed at maturity—just a sort of a revolving fund—absolutely foreign to the intent, and, as I contend, to the text of the Federal reserve act.

For a long time that great bank resisted any suggestion—and it does now—that it should be brought within the actual jurisdiction of the central authority here at Washington. At one time it was so—and I think it is now—that all Europe regarded this Federal reserve bank as "the central bank of the United States." When its governor would go abroad he was accorded the privilege of an office and a clerical staff in the Bank of England, and he was spoken of as the "governor of the central bank of the United States." In turn, when the governors of the Bank of England and the continental central banks would come here they came by invitation or notification to the governor of this one Federal reserve bank. Two members of the Federal Reserve Board once told me that the only contact this central supervising power at Washington ever had with one of these foreign central bank presidents was by courtesy of the governor of this particular Federal reserve bank.

There is not a word in the law which provides for a "governor" of a Federal reserve bank. The statute will be searched in vain for any suggestion of a "governor" of a Federal reserve bank.

While we intended to preclude all idea of central banking, we designed that the Government, through its agencies, should keep a strict supervisory control of the system, and we appointed a Government agent, one of three of the Government directors at the Federal reserve bank, who should be the presiding officer, and whom we intended to be the head officer of the bank. He has been literally brushed aside. He is a mere custodian of evidences of credit. They have set up in each of these banks a government of their own.

For a while this "board of governors" came well-nigh usurping important functions of the Federal Reserve Board here in Washington. They would have their meetings at their pleasure and convenience, resolve this, that, or the other thing, and graciously let the supervising authority here know what they had done. It was proceeding so far that the Federal Reserve Board was threatened with the humiliating status of "unofficial observers" of the transactions of the Federal reserve banking system. Finally the governor of the board here had the discernment and the courage to put a stop at least to that sort of thing, and served notice on them that they should meet only when the board required them to meet, and upon the sanction of the board.

The system has been transformed. The open-market operations of one bank alone have practically submerged the rediscount phase of banking. In their open-market operations they have never bought a dollar of commercial paper. They have made no effort to establish and foster a market for commercial paper which might be bought in the open, and thereby made more valuable than it otherwise might be. They have bought investment securities. They have bought by the millions United States bonds for which they have no use, and are doing it to-day in a futile effort to "control prices." They have about as much prospect of controlling prices as I would have of taking a broomstraw and sweeping Niagara upstream. They may improve the liquidity of certain banks in the money centers and thereby abate fears of withdrawals. The theory appears to be grounded in the fanciful expectation that these great banks are philanthropically going to let some measure of resultant prosperity drip down upon the interior banks of the country. I have not noted that this experiment has raised the price of a staple product one stiver. I can not do it unless these gentlemen have discovered something that nobody else on earth has ever discovered, and that is that manipulation of bank credits or legislative fiat can control the inexorable law of supply and demand.

SPECULATIVE BANKERS WANT NO RESTRAINT

These great speculative banks are opposed to sections 3 and 8 of the bill because they say we have no right to interfere with the independent operations of member banks or of the Federal reserve banks; that we have no right, more explicitly than the act now does, to put a stop to the use of Federal reserve facilities for stock speculative purposes. Under the 15-day provision of the existing act, 10 of the larger New York banks alone in 1929, over a period of six months, borrowed a billion dollars from the New York Federal Reserve Bank, with United States bonds as collateral security, chiefly for stock speculative purposes—not all at one time; I said over a period of six months—when they had no right to borrow a dollar for that purpose from the Federal reserve banks; it was contrary to the express provision and the real intent of the law.

To show conclusively that it never could have been the intention of Congress to authorize a stock-gambling use of Government bonds in that dangerous fashion, it need only be stated that when the Federal reserve act was passed there were less than $1,000,000,000 of United States bonds in existence. Of the amount outstanding, $748,000,000 of them were held by national banks for circulation purposes. Nearly all the balance was held in estates, by fiduciary officials, and by individuals. So that it is perfectly safe to say that there were far less than $100,000,000 of United States bonds outstanding that might be used for rediscount purposes at the Federal reserve banks. I would think less than $50,000,000 that might be used for that purpose. And yet, here 10 large banks in New York, over a period of six months, were using $1,000,000,000 of them for speculative purposes. The bill proposes to put a stop to that practice, and if it does not do that, it is not worth the paper upon which it is written and I would be willing to cast it in the scrap basket.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, section 3 and section 8 are the sections to which the Senator has been referring?

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

A GENERAL DESCRIPTION

Briefly now, in explanation of the bill itself, the first two sections simply deal with the title of the act and the definitions particularly of the banking facilities. Section 3 of the act puts a requirement upon Federal reserve banks to acquaint themselves with the condition of member banks and with the purposes for which member banks are using their funds and their facilities. I had the once governor of a great Federal reserve bank to tell me that he would not ask a member bank, seeking privileges at the Federal reserve bank, "what it was going to do with the money"; that he did not believe he had any right to ask a member bank what it was going to do with the money. It was his duty to know what the member bank was going to do with the money in order that the reserve bank might not make an irregular or illicit use of the Federal reserve facilities.

Neither a Federal reserve bank nor the Federal Reserve Board has any control over an individual bank so long as the individual bank is not seeking the privileges of the Federal reserve system; but the instant a member bank wants to recoup itself at the Federal reserve bank, it is the business of the Federal reserve bank to know the reason why. So that in this section we require a Federal reserve bank to keep itself informed and we require the agent of the Federal Reserve Board at that bank to keep the Federal Reserve Board informed. If at any time it shall appear that the member bank seeking the privileges of the Federal reserve bank is inordinately extended in stock-market transactions or unsound and unsafe loans, we empower the Federal Reserve Board, upon due notice and hearing, to suspend the facilities of the Federal reserve bank to that offending bank.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator stated that many of the banks are opposed to section 3. Am I to understand they are opposed to section 3 because they object to letting the Federal reserve banks know why they want the money?

Mr. GLASS. They object to section 3 because it empowers the Federal reserve bank and the Federal Reserve Board to prevent the misuse of Federal reserve facilities for stock speculative and other illicit purposes. It is not any increased power that we are conferring upon the Federal reserve bank and board. They have the power under existing law; but there has been a division among them as to the interpretation of the law, and this section simply makes the intent plain and the authority peremptory.

Section 4 of the bill relates to the distribution of earnings. Although the Federal Government has never expended a dollar in the maintenance of the Federal reserve system and does not own one dollar of proprietary interest, it has collected in excess of $150,000,000 from the earnings of the Federal reserve banks upon the pretense that it was a franchise tax for privileges granted. Senators will find upon examination that the 12 Federal reserve banks do, without charge, a fiscal business for the United States Government that twenty times over compensates the Government for any privilege the Federal reserve banks may have. In fact, the only privilege a Federal reserve bank has from the Government is the privilege that national banks have possessed for more than 60 years, and that is the issuance of currency. Some institution has got to issue currency under severe espionage and restriction, and, of course, the Federal reserve banks are now doing that in conjunction with the national banks.

It was originally intended that national-bank currency, which was a bond-secured currency, inelastic and at times ruinous, should be retired and that the currency of the country should automatically issue upon commercial transactions such as the law authorizes, and automatically retire at the consummation of those transactions, meeting every possible business requirement promptly and completely, and retiring so as not artificially to inflate the credits of the country. The Federal reserve banks do a fiscal business for the United States Government that has never been paid for. The Government has not floated a loan since the beginning of the World War that it has not done it through the agencies and instrumentalities of the Federal reserve banking system.

We propose now a different distribution of the earnings of the system. We propose to pay the member banks 6 per cent cumulative dividends on their stock, as always has been done. Then we propose to transfer future earnings of the banks to surplus account. We propose to recapture from the Federal Treasury $125,000,000 of the one hundred and fifty million dollars and odd that has been paid into the Treasury, and pass it to the credit of a revolving fund for prompt liquidation of failed banks. Now, when a bank fails——

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, would it interrupt the Senator if a question were asked at that point?

Mr. GLASS. No.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. GLASS. Certainly.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not want to interrupt the Senator. I am sorry I could not be here for the opening of his remarks. The $125,000,000 to which the Senator refers as being "recaptured" is money that belongs to the Government of the United States?

Mr. GLASS. Yes; and ought not to.

Mr. BLAINE. It becomes necessary to make an appropriation out of the Federal Treasury to the extent of $125,000,000?

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

Mr. BLAINE. How does that proposal fit in with the administration's plan for economy and a balancing of the Budget?

Mr. GLASS. Well, I am not a part of the administration in its detailed arrangements about economy; I had not that in view. I had only the equities of the case in view. We wanted to establish a liquidating corporation to pay the depositors of failed banks with some degree of promptness and completeness; and this was a fund that we thought, in equity, ought to be recovered and adapted to that purpose.

Mr. BLAINE. But the $125,000,000 is money that actually belongs to the people of the United States, and now it is proposed to transfer that money to a liquidating corporation without any consideration whatever.

Mr. GLASS. The Senator from Wisconsin must not have been here when I undertook to show that the Government of the United States was never equitably entitled to a dollar of that fund.

Mr. BLAINE. But that is not the point. The point is——

Mr. GLASS. Of course, the Government has actual ownership of it now or we could not "recapture" it from the Government.

Mr. BLAINE. But whether or not the money came to the Government rightly has been passed upon by the Congress. Congress stated how this money must be paid into the Treasury.

Mr. GLASS. And now I want Congress to say we shall take it back and adapt it to a better purpose.

Mr. BLAINE. This is applying $125,000,000 of Federal money to a private organization known as the "liquidating corporation."

Mr. GLASS. Yes; to a private corporation, but for public purposes.

Mr. BLAINE. For public purposes, but not for a public purpose excepting for special banks and the depositors of those special banks.

Mr. GLASS. Well, I do not think it would be profitable for the Senator and I to enter into the technical distinctions involved. As a matter of fact, if the Senator thinks the proposal impinges upon the economy program of the administration, I may remind the Senator that the administration itself for the liquidating corporation proposed by it recommended $100,000,000 out of the Public Treasury.

Mr. BLAINE. I did not want to ask the Senator that direct question, but I am glad he brought it up, as I understood the administration, acting through the Secretary of the Treasury, had proposed or approved—whichever may be the case—that this $125,000,000 be transferred from the Public Treasury to the liquidating corporation. Am I mistaken or correct in that supposition?

Mr. GLASS. The administration recommended an appropriation of $100,000,000, another branch of the Congress proposes $150,000,000, and we thought that $125,000,000 would be about right. We propose to make that change in the earnings of the Federal reserve banks, still providing that the surplus funds of the banks shall not be diminished, but from time to time shall be replenished.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. GLASS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Is it proposed that future earnings shall go into this fund instead of going to the Government as heretofore?

Mr. GLASS. No; future earnings of the fund will go into the surplus account of the Federal reserve banks. In other words, we propose to take $125,000,000 from the Federal Treasury, which we conceive to be a recapture of a part of a larger amount paid into the Treasury to which it was not entitled. Then we propose to take one-quarter of the existing surplus of the Federal reserve banks themselves and apply it to this fund; but hereafter the future earnings of the Federal reserve banks will go to the surplus fund of the Federal reserve banks and none to the Government.

Mr. NORRIS. And none to the revolving fund for the relief of depositors in failed banks?

Mr. GLASS. No; because we think the revolving fund, as we have set it up, is somewhat more than ample for that purpose.

Mr. NORRIS. It is the judgment of the committee that that fund will not need replenishing and that this money will be sufficient?

Mr. GLASS. That is true. We think it will be more than ample; and I may say that the Federal Reserve Board thinks it is excessive.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. May I ask if the bill is not a form of guaranty of bank deposits?

Mr. GLASS. No; the bill does not guarantee any bank deposits; it takes over the assets of failed banks, has them immediately estimated by competent actuaries, and, instead of waiting for a period of years—sometimes 10 or 12 years, though not often that long—instead of waiting an inordinate time, it takes over the assets by purchase or makes loans to the receiver, so that the depositors of failed banks may be promptly and, as completely as the circumstances permit, paid their money.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. GLASS. I do.

Mr. NORRIS. It is not contemplated, then, that any of this money will be used for the purpose of assisting failed banks excepting in so far as the money used will be secured and will not be liable for loss on account of the failure of a bank?

Mr. GLASS. That is true; yes.

Mr. NORRIS. In other words, it is not the idea of the bill or of the committee, as I understand, that the revolving fund will be lessened or that it will take over any assets except such assets as are considered perfectly good?

Mr. GLASS. That is true; yes. The revolving fund will have, as we conceive, accretions or earnings, 70 per cent of which will go to the revolving fund and 30 per cent of which will go to the member banks as an additional dividend.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

Mr. WAGNER. Perhaps I did not listen carefully. Is not also a contribution to be made of a certain percentage of the deposits of the member banks?

Mr. GLASS. I am about to refer to that.

Mr. WAGNER. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. GLASS. In addition to the recapture of $125,000,000 from the Federal Treasury, and taking over one-fourth of the surplus fund of the Federal reserve banks, the bill makes an assessment of one-quarter of 1 per cent of the deposits of the member banks as a contribution to this fund. One call is expected to be made within 90 days after the passage of the bill, should it become a law, and the other call held in reserve, to be made if necessary; but the committee frankly does not think it will ever be necessary to make the second call.

Mr. NORRIS. That will make up a total fund of how much?

Mr. GLASS. These direct contributions to the revolving fund will make up a sum total of approximately $400,000,000—between three hundred and fifty and four hundred million dollars. I will ask the Senator from Delaware if that is not correct.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I think that is correct.

Mr. GLASS. In addition to that, we authorize the liquidating corporation to issue its own debentures to twice that amount. We do not think it would ever have to issue debentures, but the administration made a proposal of that sort in the measure suggested by it, and we took that over. Frankly, however, we do not think the corporation will ever have to issue its debentures, because we think the direct contribution is certainly ample, if not more than ample, for the purpose. As I have indicated, the governor of the Federal Reserve Board thinks it is excessive. Therefore there has been a suggestion that we make the assessment against member banks one-eighth of 1 per cent rather than one-fourth of 1 per cent. That is a matter for the decision of the Senate. As the committee reported the bill, it provides for an assessment of one-quarter of 1 per cent.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. GLASS. I do.

Mr. WAGNER. The administration bill, so called, which attempted to set up the same type of liquidating corporation, did not provide for any contribution represented by a percentage of the assets of the member banks into the fund.

Mr. GLASS. No; it did not.

Mr. WAGNER. In that respect the pending bill differs from the administration bill.

Mr. GLASS. It differs in that respect, and it differs in another respect: The member banks are to receive 30 per cent of the earnings of the corporation, and, therefore, we did not think it would work any hardship upon them at all to make this assessment.

Now let me discuss that question for just a moment to show how utterly unreasonable some of the bankers are at times when they think their interests are affected. They were perfectly willing to agree to, or, if not perfectly willing, they were acquiescent in the proposition to contribute 2 per cent of their deposits or 10 per cent of their capital and surplus to the so-called National Credit Corporation in New York, over which they had not one particle of control; and yet they are caviling about contributing one-quarter of 1 per cent to this liquidating corporation, 30 per cent of the earnings of which will be returned to them. The fact of the matter is, I may say incidentally in passing—and I have a good many incidental comments to make—when things occur which excite the moral indignation of any man who considers them—we never would have had any National Credit Corporation in New York but for the fact that the people who were implored to organize it received assurances down here first that the corporation would be taken over by the Federal reserve banking system and that its frozen assets would be dumped en bloc in the lap of the Federal reserve banks. When it was found that some of us here in Congress would resist that to the bitter end, they were told the corporation would be taken over by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and that has practically been done. So all of this talk about the "great liberality and generosity" of the organizers of the National Credit Corporation disappears in thin air when the facts involved are scrutinized.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I think it would be profitable if the Senator would explain in a little more detail from what sources, if any, the revolving fund is going to derive an income. Is there anything in addition to the interest it might receive on the assets of the bank which might be purchased?

Mr. GLASS. No.

Mr. NORRIS. Can the Senator give us any idea as to what the income might be or would probably be from that source?

Mr. GLASS. We could only conjecture about it.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, there would be some liability also; that is, losses might occasionally occur.

Mr. GLASS. Possibly; but I would not say that it is at all probable. The liquidating corporation would have experienced and capable actuaries, and it would immediately pay only a large measure of the losses to the depositors—not all of them. I think—and that was the considered judgment of the committee—that if they proceeded with anything like due care the corporation would be obliged to earn a substantial dividend for the member banks, and to carry to the revolving fund a substantial sum each year.

If we are going to have approximately within a thousand miles as many bank failures as we have had in the last two years, the corporation would get wealthy if it was managed with any degree of skill.

BANK AFFILIATES

Another problem that confronted your committee was the question of bank affiliates. That is going to be discussed in some detail by two of my colleagues, and I shall make just a passing reference to this aspect of banking.

The committee ascertained in a more or less definite way—we think quite a definite way—that one of the greatest contributions to the unprecedented disaster which has caused this almost incurable depression was made by these bank affiliates. They sent out their high-pressure salesmen and literally filled the bank portfolios of this country with these investment securities. They actually dealt in the stocks of the parent bank; and one of them notably offended by running the stock of a parent bank above 500, and a few days ago it was down to 42. They were organized to evade the law. That is the very purpose of their existence—to evade the national bank act and to do a business outlawed by the national bank act—and yet they are so interlocked that it is difficult to tell which is which.

Right here I am tempted to say to the Senate that a few days ago I came into possession of information that literally astonished me. I learned that one of the most distinguished lawyers at the American bar, at one time president of the American Bar Association, Solicitor General of the United States under President Taft, had given an exhaustive, searching opinion as to the legality of national-bank affiliates. I have read the opinion. Although not a lawyer, I venture to pronounce it a legal classic, searching and sweeping. The opinion is, in effect, an unmistakable declaration that national-bank affiliates are absolutely illegal, that they contravene the national bank act, that the parent bank contravenes the national charter, and the affiliate in many instances the State statute and the charter of the State from which it derives its existence. Court opinion after court opinion of both inferior courts and the Supreme Court of the United States are cited.

No action was ever taken under this tremendously important opinion of the Solicitor General of the United States. Not only was no action taken, but it is within the confines of fact to say that the opinion was suppressed; and few things have ever happened in this country that better illustrate the power and the blandishments of inordinate wealth, because the opinion dealt with institutions and individuals who had accumulated inordinate wealth. Not only did the Attorney General at that time fail to act, but another Attorney General, some years afterwards, elevated to a place of even higher distinction, declined to permit the opinion to be made public; with what result? With the result that these institutions, declared by the Solicitor General of the United States to be engaged in illicit practices, were perhaps the greatest contributors to the riot of credit and inflation in 1928–29, with the result that the country is now almost in an irreparable condition.

I have gotten permission, of which I think I shall avail, to insert in the RECORD as a part of my remarks this opinion of Solicitor General Lehmann, which clearly discloses, to my mind, as far as I am competent to judge legal distinctions, that the activities of these affiliates are not only disastrous, as we now witness, but that they are absolutely illegal. Yet, although we give them three years, and most, if not all, the members of the committee are willing to give them five years, to separate themselves from the parent banks, to make a readjustment of their capital organizations, they are desperately trying to defeat that provision of the bill.

There was some difference of opinion in the subcommittee and in the general committee—and I want to deal with these various questions openly and frankly—as to whether we should permit national-bank affiliates to continue business under severe espionage and restrictions and requirements of examination and report, or whether we should require them to separate; and that is a question that the Senate must gravely consider. Some of us felt that perhaps it were better to let them continue in business with restrictions as to the loans they may make and restrictions in many other respects, together with the requirement that we have now in the bill that they must be examined periodically by the bank examiners and cotemporaneously examined with the parent bank, because it would be a very defective examination if made at a different time. Some of us felt that perhaps that would be a better restraint and restriction upon them than to separate them entirely and leave them to their own devices under State charter and State law. That the Senate must determine.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. GLASS. I do.

Mr. MOSES. In order to clarify the situation and get the chronology straight, the opinion of Solicitor General Lehmann to which the Senator has referred must have been rendered something like 20 years ago, if rendered when he was in office.

Mr. GLASS. Yes; but if it was good law then, it is good law to-day.

Mr. MOSES. Yes; but in the meantime the whole banking structure has been recast by reason of the creation of the Federal reserve bank system. At the time Solicitor General Lehmann rendered his opinion it was under the old national banking act; was it not?

Mr. GLASS. Yes; and under the present national banking act; and everything he said then applies to-day. It has nothing to do with the reserve banking system.

Mr. MOSES. And the Senator, as I understood, said that the opinion had lain moldering or covered with dust for 20 years, all through various administrations of the banking act.

Mr. GLASS. Oh, yes. I am not criticizing any particular administration.

Mr. MOSES. Nor is the Senator trying to exculpate himself during his own administration of the Treasury Department?

Mr. GLASS. No; not the least bit. I had no knowledge of it then; and the Comptroller of the Currency had no knowledge of it five days ago, although it ought to be right in his office.

Mr. MOSES. Under those circumstances, it must be very interesting to know the various courses that opinion took before it has now come to the surface and into the possession of the Senator.

Mr. GLASS. Yes. The present Attorney General very graciously permitted me to have a photostatic copy made from the original—and only the original exists in the Attorney General's office. It could not be found in the comptroller's office. There is the public official who is the czar of the national banking system. There is the public official charged by law with strict supervision of the national banking system, and yet no copy of this important opinion of the Solicitor General of the United States could be found in his archives. The comptroller very readily complied with my request, however, to ask the Attorney General to let me have a copy of it, and they gave me a photostatic copy of the original.

Mr. MOSES. If the Senator will permit me to suggest further, now that the Senator has come in possession of a copy of this important opinion, I hope that the intimation which he has just made, that he will insert it in his remarks, will be carried out, because I am sure it will be of transcendent consequence to Senators considering this legislation.

Mr. GLASS. I think so, and for that reason I urged the Attorney General to permit me, with some desirable excisions, to print it in the RECORD. I am not concerned with the personalities or the particular institution involved. I am only concerned with the law, and I want it distinctly understood that I am not seeking to involve any of the present officials in any criticism which might be implied, and my friend from New Hampshire will find it impossible to get me into any partisan mood or posture in discussing banking matters.

Mr. MOSES rose.

Mr. GLASS. The Attorney General, who refused to permit access to the opinion or its publication, was a Democrat, if the Senator wants to know.

Mr. MOSES. I want to assure the Senator from Virginia that I have no intention whatever of trying to entice him into any posture regarding his legislation which could possibly be regarded as partisan, because upon both sides of the Chamber it is well recognized that the Senator has lent his great talents and his wide knowledge of the banking situation to an entirely nonpartisan and wholly patriotic effort to bring about legislation which would help relieve the country from the situation in which it now finds itself, and every Member of the Senate, regardless of any shade of partisanship which he may have, feels himself under a great debt of gratitude to the Senator for the labors which he has rendered in this session.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, if I had my hat on I would take it off to the Senator from New Hampshire in token of my very deep appreciation of what he has said.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. BRATTON. Will the Senator tell us the circumstances under which the Solicitor General rendered the opinion, that is to say, at whose request?

Mr. GLASS. At the request of the then Attorney General.

Mr. MOSES. And because, may I ask further, of the fact that this system of affiliates was then beginning to show itself in the national banking system?

Mr. GLASS. As it had shown itself, just in the form and aspect that it has to-day.

Mr. MOSES. Did that arise from any of the restrictions under the old national banking act, which still continue, which hampered the banks under the national banking act, as they probably thought, in the range of investments that they might make, and they were seeking subterfuges whereby to extend the area of their investments?

Mr. GLASS. As they surely thought, yes; and that is why they organized the affiliates—there was no other reason in the world for it—as annexes, as back doors, to the parent banks. In other words, they were precluded by the whole spirit and text of the national bank act from doing the things which they were organized to do, and which they are doing now, in contravention of the requirements of the bank act.

I sincerely hope that the lawyers in this body will read the opinion, because it amounts to a demonstration that the organization of these affiliates was contrary not only to the text but to the history and the tradition and the spirit of the national bank act.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. With a view of having more of the Senators read this opinion, I would like to ask the Senator whether, in addition to publishing it in the RECORD, he will not ask that it be published as a Senate document?

Mr. GLASS. That had occurred to me, and I think perhaps it should be so printed. Let me make this clear: I have no evidence in support of any supposition that might arise that the Attorney General agreed with Mr. Lehmann's opinion, nor have I any reason to suppose that he disagreed with it, except that nothing was ever done. The opinion disappeared almost from the face of the earth. No copy of it could be found in the office of the comptroller, especially and specifically charged with the conduct of national banking and administrative affairs, and I had to get it in the way I have indicated.

Mr. NORRIS. Why not make the request now?

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this opinion of the Solicitor General, Mr. Frederick W. Lehmann, to which I have made reference, be printed in the RECORD and as a public document, with certain excisions which I have agreed to make as to the institution and the persons involved.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the opinion referred to will be printed as a part of the Senator's remarks and also as a public document.

(See Exhibit A.)

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I shall not discuss affiliates further, because two of my colleagues have been charged with the responsible duty of doing that.

A JURISDICTIONAL MATTER

We have inserted in the bill, section 25, relating to court jurisdiction of foreign bank law violations. Naturally I am not so familiar with the technicalities of that subject. I was rather inclined to object to that provision, having gotten some faint idea that when lawyers in this or any other body begin a discussion of jurisdictional matters they consume a great deal of time, and I wanted to get the bill through. But the Senators who are lawyers can determine whether or not that provision of the bill shall remain in it.

BANK CAPITALIZATION

In the matter of capitalization of national banks, our inquiry very thoroughly revealed the fact that approximately 80 per cent, if not a greater percentage, of bank failures in recent years were due to inadequate capitalization. They were of small banks, hundreds of them mere pawnshops which never should have been chartered. Their failure, notwithstanding their inconsequential activities in some respects, created a psychology which was extremely detrimental to the whole banking and business community. When three or four small banks in any given section of the country in any State fail, the fact of the failure of three or four banks in that section, however small they may be, begins to create consternation, to undermine public confidence, and to create runs on the larger and stronger banks.

There are vastly too many banks in this country now. It has been suggested that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has done a wholesome work by arresting bank failures. That may be so. I would be interested to know just to what extent its activities have had that result. There have been so many bank failures that there are very few real weak banks left to fail. Unless we pass this bank bill, or enact some of its provisions, there are going to be bank failures of institutions which are now regarded as entirely sound and solvent.

We have raised the minimum capitalization of national banks, and made it $100,000, "except that such associations with a capital of not less than $50,000 may be organized in any place the population of which does not exceed 6,000 inhabitants."

Mr. TYDINGS. On what page is that?

HOLDING COMPANIES

Mr. GLASS. Pages 36 and 37. Somewhat akin to investment bank affiliates, we undertake to deal with the question of holding companies, the system of holding companies being one species of what is known as chain banking. It is a species of chain banking that is largely devoid of responsibility.

Some of these holding companies have been admirably managed, managed by bankers of character, long experience, and great skill. Many of them have done no great harm. In fact, they will tell you that they have done great good. But the committee was convinced that they needed pretty severe supervision, restraint, and examination, and I want to say for those officials that they were cheerfully willing that that should be provided. We have incorporated in that provision of the bill many of the suggestions made by them, not because they were made by them, but in spite of the fact, because all of us were very suspicious when we entered upon the consideration of that phase of banking.

There is this to be said, that if one of those holding companies—as some of them have—should come under the administration of unscrupulous persons, the amount of harm that might ensue is hard to conceive. Therefore we have undertaken to encompass them with such restrictions and restraints and requirements of examination and report as, we hope, may induce them perhaps to go out of that sort of banking at their convenience.

There is one, to me, extremely amusing aspect of the topic, and that is the inured ignorance of some bankers who came to Washington to speak for the banking community. They were invited here by their legislative guardians, and after getting here were drilled in a night school, as it were. I am not prepared to say whether they were tutored in the daytime as well as at nighttime, but I suspect at both times. They appear to have been told exactly what objections to make to the bill when they should appear before the committee at a later hearing. What amuses me right now is that I recall that in one provision of the bill we sought to liberalize the discount rate at member banks, not so much as an accommodation to the banks but as an accommodation to the public. One of the pupils of this night school who came before our committee vehemently objected to that provision of the bill because, he said, it was a restriction upon the interest charge that banks might make. It was just the reverse.

There are 34 States which limit the discount charge at their banks to 6 per cent. There are a few which make it 7 per cent and two or three States which permit a discount charge as high as 10 per cent. Formerly they had permitted a charge of 12 per cent, but I think no State goes that high just now. The result of these restrictions, particularly of this restriction of 6 per cent, in time of exigency when Federal reserve banks think the rediscount rate should be raised, would be paralysis of credit. In other words, if the rediscount rate of the Federal reserve bank in certain districts should be 6 per cent, that would practically preclude the members banks from rediscounting at the Federal reserve bank except perhaps at a loss.

If the rediscount rate should be 7 per cent, as it was in four of the Federal reserve banks in 1920, that would estop the member banks of those four districts from rediscounting except at an actual loss of 1 per cent on every rediscount made. So we inserted a provision, which is existing law, that member banks may charge the rate of discount prescribed by the State law or 1 per cent above the rediscount rate of the Federal reserve banks of a given district. Therefore, rediscounting in no event may be precluded. That is the provision to which this pupil of the night school strenuously objected, when it was to his own advantage and he did not know it. I had to take him aside and explain it to him.

DISMISSAL OF OFFENDING BANK OFFICIALS

It appeared from our inquiry that the office of the Comptroller of the Currency, not simply the incumbent Comptroller of the Currency but at all times as far back as we know anything about it, has been greatly perplexed and embarrassed in the enforcement of the law authorizing him to close what seems to him to be an insolvent bank. The comptroller has great reluctance to apply the drastic condemnation of the law. He waits, sometimes vastly too long, before he takes action. The comptroller now, who is a most worthy gentleman, scholarly, studious, courageous, I believe, in his testimony before the committee admitted that the comptroller's office—not himself, but the comptroller's office—had knowledge of the precarious condition of that large bank at Louisville the failure of which spread consternation and distress over a great part of that country and of another bank in Tennessee the failure of which did likewise; that the comptroller's office had knowledge that these banks were engaged in irregular and unsound if not actually illicit business five years before the failure came; that the files of the comptroller's office were replete with admonitory letters, with letters severely protesting against the practices in those banks over a period of years; but they did not close up the banks because of this reluctance of the comptroller's office to resort to that severe proceeding.

I took the liberty of suggesting to the comptroller that he would have better severely dealt with those banks five years theretofore, so that the failure which was inevitable when it came would not have been so extensive and disastrous. But he suggested, and we have acted upon the suggestion, that there should be a less drastic penalty. The only penalty now is to close up the banks. No matter how much he may admonish them, they disregard the admonition; they disregard what is called the "criticism" of the examiner and of the comptroller's office. So we have embodied in the bill a provision which authorizes the comptroller and the Federal reserve agent, when a bank is found in irregular and illicit and unsound practices which it either fails or refuses to correct, to summon these bank officials to a court of inquiry and give them a thorough hearing and, if the facts sufficiently warrant it, to suspend or dismiss the officers of the bank.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. GLASS. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. How would the official places be filled?

Mr. GLASS. By the board of directors.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. In the same manner that the original officers were chosen?

Mr. GLASS. Yes; but the board would be precluded from reelecting the offending officials.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. GLASS. Certainly.

Mr. WHEELER. What right would they have to suspend the officers of a local or private bank?

Mr. GLASS. None as regards a private bank.

Mr. WHEELER. Of a national bank? I doubt the legality of such a provision. I doubt that they would have the right legally to suspend officers of a national bank.

Mr. GLASS. We are advised that the section as drawn is entirely legal. They are to serve notice upon the offending director or officer and give him a hearing, and we should think that they would have as much lawful right to dismiss such an officer as they would to go to the courts and close the bank. It would be a very much more salutary and helpful proceeding.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator will recall that that difficulty was brought up in the committee.

Mr. GLASS. Yes; I recall the Senator from Wisconsin objected to that provision of the bill.

Mr. BLAINE. I may suggest to the Senator from Virginia that I have had prepared an amendment which I think avoids the situation to which the Senator from Montana refers.

Mr. GLASS. I am glad the Senator has given it that consideration.

Mr. BLAINE. I doubt very much if an officer of a State bank which is a member bank could be compelled to be removed from office or could be removed from office. I think an amendment will cure that situation. I expect to offer that amendment at the proper time.

(At this point Mr. GLASS yielded the floor for the day.)

BRANCH BANKING

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, on yesterday I tried to present an outline of S. 4412, being the banking bill reported by the Senate Banking and Currency Committee in response to Senate Resolution 71. I am not sure that I made as clear and complete an explanation of the bill as I might desire to do and as would leave in the minds of Senators a comprehensive understanding of the bill; but I did the best I could in the circumstances.

I think, perhaps, I left untouched one of the most controversial provisions of the bill and that I shall undertake to explain to-day. It relates to the problem of branch banking. That is a question which has been controverted over a long period of years and upon which no definite conclusion of any value has been reached by the Congress. When the Federal reserve bill was under consideration it was proposed to authorize member banks under certain limitations to engage in state-wide branch banking.

Another question presented at that time was that of guaranteeing the deposits of member banks. Both the Senate and the House rejected the branch-bank proposals. The Senate incorporated in the bill, on motion of Senator John Sharp Williams, urgently supported by Senator Thomas, of Colorado, what was called a deposit-insurance provision, but that went out in conference.

I may say that at the time I strongly resisted both propositions, but, after studious, if not prayerful, consideration of the problem during the period which has elapsed since the adoption of the Federal reserve system, I have very reluctantly come to the conclusion that we ought to authorize state-wide branch banking by member banks of the system. I know very plausible objections are urged to the contrary, but in my view they are only plausible; they were that when used by me in opposition to the system years ago; they are that now.

One objection is that to authorize branch banking would be an invasion of the sovereign rights of the States. I do not think the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Supreme Court of the United States have left the States with any sovereign rights; but it seems to me, Mr. President, rather an untenable argument to insist that the Congress may authorize the establishment of a national banking system in all the States, but that it would be an invasion of the sovereign rights of the States to authorize such banks to establish branches and to conduct their business in various parts of the States rather than in one place.

The Congress, sustained by a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, completely swept away the rights of the States in matters relating to the banking business when it imposed on State-bank circulation a 10 per cent tax, which was prohibitory, and under existing law, as confirmed by the courts, no State bank may issue its notes; only national banks and Federal reserve banks have the power of issuance except under prohibitive taxation. Therefore, I have come to the conclusion that it is no invasion of the rights of the States for Congress to authorize a national bank to establish branches; certainly it is no greater invasion of the rights of the States than the 10 per cent tax on State-bank issues or than the original authorization for the establishment of a national bank. Only by sanction of Congress may a State tax a national bank.

Moreover, Mr. President, when we take the practical view of branch banking and the problems involved, the system appeals to the common sense of some of us who have thoroughly investigated the question; and so I am thoroughly convinced not only of the equity and feasibility of branch banking but of the real necessity for it in order to save the situation that now confronts the country.

We have now a species of nation-wide branch banking in this country that concentrates in the money centers an enormous fund contributed by the interior banks. In other words, as I suggested yesterday, thousands of the country banks of this Nation are in involuntary servitude to the great banks in the money centers by reason of the fact that we do have a species of irresponsible nation-wide branch banking. Every one of the large banks in the money centers makes a monetary exaction from every one of its correspondent banks wherever situated in the 48 States of the Union. The correspondent banks are required to carry a certain deposit with the large banks, the requital being a nominal interest, together with such accommodations, real or imaginary, as the large banks in the money centers may extend to the country banks throughout the States. As I tried to indicate yesterday, the accommodations thus afforded practically put the interior banks in subjection, subtle it may be, but real after all, to the large banks in the money centers; so that any "advice" volunteered, any expression of judgment that may issue as to the purchase of investment securities or as to any policy that may be proposed or pursued in the last analysis, amounts to a species of coercion.

I have heard banker after banker say since this problem of bank reformation has recently been discussed that they had purchased certain securities not because they wanted them, not because they were confident that they would be remunerative or that the facilities of their respective banks would justify their purchase, but because they were indebted to the offering banks for accommodations extended. I insist, as I have done over and over again, that there is no need of these correspondent banks in the large cities. Any bank doing a sound commercial banking business can get all the accommodations it may require at its Federal reserve bank. But this system has grown up and it amounts to a vicious species of nation-wide branch banking without the responsibility that properly attaches to a sound branch-banking system.

There is a dispute, though I do not see how there can be, as to the efficiency of the branch-banking system which prevails in Canada and which has prevailed there for many years. I am not advocating that we have that same system in this country, but it has proven very effective in Canada. During the last 65 years there have been but 26 bank failures in Canada, and not one during this period of frightful depression! Since 1923 we have had nearly 5,000 bank failures in the United States, while they have had but 1 bank failure in Canada. The significant part of it is not the number of bank failures so much as the volume of losses that occur.

As I recall the figures, which I have here, in all the history of Canadian banking, the total volume of losses to depositors of failed banks was $13,500,000, whereas the Comptroller of the Currency informed your committee that the losses to depositors of failed banks in this country in the last two years aggregated two and a half billions of dollars.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. WATSON. Does the Senator attribute that difference solely to the branch-banking system of Canada?

Mr. GLASS. Oh, no; I do not attribute it solely to the branch-banking system.

Mr. WATSON. I just wanted to get the Senator's idea of the causes of the difference.

Mr. GLASS. But I think the branch-banking system is largely responsible for the more efficient operation of banks in Canada.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. KEAN. Would the Senator mind stating how many banks there are in Canada?

Mr. GLASS. I think there are 16; but they have innumerable branches. Of course, when a large bank with a number of branches fails the disaster covers a large territory. There is no doubt about that. I am not proposing, however, the Canadian system of branch banking. It is inconceivable that this country will ever have but 16 banks. Moreover, we are not proposing nation-wide branch banking. We are proposing to confine it to State lines.

There is a provision in the bill that in very exceptional circumstances, with the assent of the Comptroller of the Currency or the Federal Reserve Board, would enable a bank to cross State lines for a distance of 50 miles from the parent bank in order to maintain the business of its established trade area. Speaking for myself, however, and not for the committee, I would cheerfully have that provision go out, because I urged before the committee that it was simply going to afford a peg for the opposition to hang an objection upon, and it would take care of an inappreciable number of banks and communities.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. GLASS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. I desire to ask the Senator about the one bank that failed in Canada. Did it have branches?

Mr. GLASS. Oh, yes; it had a number of branches.

Mr. NORRIS. Were they all closed?

Mr. GLASS. I think 9 of them were closed and 5 of the 9 were rescued, and the total loss to the depositors was less than a million dollars.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. GLASS. I do.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator has described the national branch-banking system which we have by reason of the practice which has grown up. If we establish the State branch-banking system, will that increase or will it diminish the strength of the system which we have now?

Mr. GLASS. I think it will greatly impair the force of it, if it will not eventually break it up.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. GLASS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think, under the laws as they exist, branch banking is allowed in States which permit branch banking. One thing that this bill does—and I wanted to hear the Senator on that—is to allow branch banking in States which prohibit branch banking; in other words, in all States, without regard to whether the States prohibit branch banking or not. There are a few States that do not allow branch banking. This bill would permit the establishment of branch banking in all the States without regard to the State regulation on the subject.

Mr. GLASS. I have tried to indicate that there is no law of any State that permits national banks to be established, and yet the Congress of the United States has authorized the establishment of national banks in the 48 States of the Union. There is no State law that prohibits a State bank from issuing its notes as currency, or that imposes a tax upon State bank issues; and yet the Congress of the United States has practically prohibited the issuance of notes in the form of currency by State banks.

Moreover, on that point it may be said that there is not a State that might not, if it so pleases, adjust itself to this proposition of allowing national banks to establish branches; and I should be willing to predict that if the Congress enacts this bill into law, there is not a State in the Union that will not promptly authorize its State banks to get on an equality of competition with the national banks by adopting the state-wide branch banking system.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia further yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I suggest in that connection that in those States which now do not allow branch banking, the banks are getting around the situation by organizing affiliates. National banks establish affiliates even in those States which prohibit branch banking, and those affiliates are doing exactly what a branch bank would do.

Mr. GLASS. Exactly. The affiliates and the holding companies are acquiring long chains of banks. Not only that; in many instances they are buying up banks. They have systems of chain banks without the responsibility of unit banking or of branch banking, because where a bank has a branch the double liability of the stockholder prevails. Moreover, in the provision of this bill we do not permit the establishment of a branch unless and until the parent bank, if it does not already possess the required amount of capital, shall increase its capital by the amount that is required for the establishment of a unit bank in any given community.

It will be interesting to the Senate to know that during the 11-year period from 1921 to 1931, inclusive, there were 8,221 bank failures in this country.

Mr. TYDINGS. How many banks are there?

Mr. GLASS. There are approximately 22,000 institutions called banks; but thousands of them were little pawnshops that never should have been chartered either by the Federal Government or by State governments. Fifty-nine per cent, or 4,861 of these suspended banks had a capital of $25,000 or less; 25½ per cent, or 2,175 of these banks had a capital exceeding $25,000 but not exceeding $50,000; and of the 8,221 failures, only 37 banks, or four-tenths of 1 per cent, had a capital of as much as $1,000,000. Over 60 per cent of these failures occurred in communities with a population of less than 1,000 inhabitants, and over 90 per cent of these failures occurred in cities and towns with a population of less than 25,000 inhabitants.

It is, therefore, obvious that the problem is largely one of small rural bank failures. Right here, I pause to say what I have repeatedly said before in discussing this question—that the appeal of the little bank, so called, against the "monopolistic" tendencies of branch banking, is misleading when we come to reason about it.

The fact is that the little banker is the "monopolist." He wants to exclude credit facilities from any other source than from his bank. He wants to monopolize the credit accommodations of his community. He does not want any other bank in his State to come there. If it is a manufacturing enterprise, he welcomes it. Whether it be a branch of some great industrial operation or otherwise, he welcomes it; but if it is to trade in credit, if it is to accommodate the commercial and industrial borrowing demands of the community, he wants to monopolize that himself.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas in the chair). Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. GLASS. I do.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator stated the number of bank suspensions throughout the country. Can he state how many of those were national banks?

Mr. GLASS. Incomparably fewer were national banks than State banks. In proportion to the number of national banks, as compared with State banks, I should say that approximately the failures would be five to one of State banks as compared with national banks.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think those figures can be obtained, separating national banks from State banks.

Mr. GLASS. They can be obtained from the comptroller; yes. I may have them here; and when we come to a more immediate discussion of the various provisions of the bill, I shall have some things to say that it is not necessary to say here now.

Mr. President, I have been now for nearly 32 years a member of the Banking and Currency Committees of the other branch of Congress and of the Senate. I have been an intent listener and observer of all measures of importance that have been considered; and I assert here that never in that whole period has any merchant or business man having relationships with banks ever protested against branch banking. No man who has wanted credit, no man who wanted to borrow funds with which to conduct his business has ever in that whole period raised his voice against branch banking. It has only been done by the bank which wanted a monopoly of credit in its community.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I dislike to interrupt the Senator, but I would like to ask him whether the champions of the branch-banking policy have not, on the other hand, been the people who want to enter that field? The Senator says there has been no one opposed to it except those interested on the other side.

Mr. GLASS. I think the insistent proponents of branch banking are people who want credit, who do not want to be confined to the inadequate facilities of their respective communities. Take that restriction of the national bank act which prohibits any bank from loaning to any customer, partnership, concern, or corporation more than 10 per cent of its capital and surplus. That provision of the national bank act requires thousands of business industries and commercial concerns in this country to go to the large money centers to get credit, because the banks in their respective communities can not, under the restrictions of the national bank act, grant them adequate credit.

Take the great shoe industry of my own town, with a population of 45,000 people. The national banks there combined can not begin to respond adequately to the requirements of those industrial concerns, with the result that they have to go to New York, and to Boston, particularly to Boston, and to other large money centers, to get credit.

If a great tobacco industry in Richmond should want to establish a branch house or factory in my town, do Senators imagine there is a human being there who would object to it? Then if some bank should want to sell credit in my town, why should anybody object to it?

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. If what the Senator says now about the tobacco concern or the shoe concern in his town be the fact, what significance has this provision regarding the paid-in capital of the branch banks of $500,000? How would that insure safety to stockholders of that concern?

Mr. GLASS. I do not think any question of safety is involved. We provide that no bank with a capital of less than $500,000 may establish these branches throughout the States.

Mr. COPELAND. Is that what this language means?

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

Mr. COPELAND. "No such association shall establish a branch outside of the city, town, or village in which it is situated unless it"—meaning the association?

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

Mr. COPELAND. Not the branch?

Mr. GLASS. No; the association. It requires that when it establishes a branch anywhere else it must enlarge its capital to the extent that would be required for the establishment of an independent bank in that community.

Mr. COPELAND. I do not think the language in the measure is clear.

Mr. GLASS. Perhaps not. We think it is.

Mr. COPELAND. It could be read either way, either that the association should have paid-in capital, or that the branch should have the paid-in capital. I think it should be made very specific so there would be no doubt as to its meaning. If the association had an increased capital of $500,000 because it had a branch in Richmond, and the Richmond concern were permitted to borrow far in excess of that, I can not see how protection would be given by reason of that slight increase in capital.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Virginia yield to me?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. If I may interrupt the Senator just a moment, I was interested in his statement with reference to branch banks being able to extend better credit facilities. In Montana, where we have had, not the branch-bank system but the chain banks, there has been a general complaint on the part of stockmen and other people of that character to the effect that since the chain banks came into the State, they have not been able to get the credit facilities which they formerly had with the other independent banking group. I received a letter just the other day from an individual who is comparatively wealthy for that section of the country, stating that the banks out there at the present time would extend no credit, even though he had resources and owed no money whatsoever.

Mr. GLASS. The Senator can get letters of that sort from any community in the United States, for that matter.

Mr. WHEELER. That is true, but that has been a general complaint in my State with reference to the chain banks since they have come into the State.

Mr. GLASS. What we want to do is to break up chain banking, which is an irresponsible species of banking, and substitute for it branch banking, which is an entirely responsible species of banking.

Mr. WHEELER. I agree with the Senator that branch banking would be better than chain banking, but I do not know how this measure would break up the latter.

For instance, as the Senator said, these chain banks buy up the stock of banks, my understanding is, and put it into a holding company, and the holding company may or may not be responsible for the double liability on the stock.

Mr. GLASS. They are not responsible.

Mr. WHEELER. They are not responsible.

Mr. GLASS. Some of them, by State law, are responsible.

Mr. WHEELER. They may be or they may not be.

Mr. GLASS. Some of them were wise enough to make themselves responsible by their charter provisions—notably so in Michigan.

Mr. WHEELER. How would this bill break up chain banking? I am asking the Senator for information and not with the idea of criticizing.

Mr. GLASS. It is the view of the committee, upon information presented, that if we do not adopt state-wide branch banking, the holding companies and the banks which they hold are going to be pretty soon wrecked. I do not know that it ought to be stated here, but we want to consider this whole problem in frankness. If the existing requirements of the law were put into effect by the Comptroller of the Currency, there are thousands of banks which have not yet closed their doors, whose capital and surplus have been impaired, which would have to be closed up to-day, and unless we do something of this nature, that part of the country where these holding companies exist—and they are not confined to any one section, though perhaps they are more numerous in the northwestern section of the country than in any other section—are going to find themselves in inextricable difficulties.

Mr. WHEELER. What I would like to have the Senator explain to me is how this measure would help them out. I do not see how this particularly would help them out.

Mr. GLASS. They would convert their banks into branches. They would convert their holding companies into banks. They would convert the banks which they hold into branches, with the double liability. If they are as skillful as they have seemed to us to be, they would manage to increase their capital holdings so as to insure the soundness and solvency of these banks as branches.

Mr. WHEELER. Even though they did put them into branches, state-wide branches, now, for instance, the holding companies are at Minneapolis, and hold a string of banks through North Dakota, South Dakota, Wyoming, Nebraska, and Montana, and under the provisions of this measure they could not turn their holding companies and their affiliates into branch banks, because this would only extend as far as the State line. Is that correct?

Mr. GLASS. Yes; it would extend only to the State line.

Mr. WHEELER. So that they would have to set up branches in each one of these States.

Mr. GLASS. Undoubtedly they would have to set up a parent bank in each one of the States. If the Senator wants to know what those people out there think of the situation, I exhibit to him this pile of telegrams, and I have received probably 2,000 such messages in the last three days from those people, which very clearly indicate their apprehension that if something of this sort is not done that section of the country and other sections of the country are going to have numerous bank failures.

Mr. WHEELER. I am not very much disturbed about the Senator's telegrams——

Mr. GLASS. No; and I am not, either. I have never invited one in the 30 years I have been in Congress; I have never inspired one; I have never had my judgment affected by one. I am every day getting propaganda inspired by the superintendent of State banks of my State, who does not appear to know that his own State authorizes state-wide branch banking in large measure. Does anybody think I am simple enough to be influenced by propaganda of that sort?

Not one of these banks would have ever thought of initiating letters to me about a matter of that sort if this bank official had not been guilty of the gross impropriety of starting that sort of propaganda. I have a contempt for it, and I am not governed by these 2,000 telegrams in favor of this so-called Glass bank bill. I made up my mind as to its various provisions long ago without getting any telegram from any source. But I just wanted to indicate to the Senator what the people of Montana and of the Dakotas and Wyoming and Michigan and Wisconsin and of all that section of the country think about the situation, what their apprehensions are as to what will happen if we do not get some measure of sound branch banking enacted.

Mr. WHEELER. Those telegrams are not, in my judgment, from the rank and file, or from the merchants of the country, except in so far as they have been inspired by the chain-banking group, and for that reason——

Mr. GLASS. I do not know who inspired the telegrams. I know I did not.

Mr. WHEELER. I understand that.

Mr. GLASS. And I know I am not influenced by them. But I am interested in having the Senator know that upon examination he will find that at least two-thirds of them, if not a greater percentage, are from people who are not bankers, but are business men, the patrons of the banks, who want accommodations at the banks.

Mr. WHEELER. As I have said, they have been inspired by the banks, and my comment is the same as what the Senator said about the telegrams, that lots of people who send telegrams do not know what they are talking about when they send them.

Mr. GLASS. No; and that applies to those opposing this bill as well as those favoring it. There was a night school here in Washington, at which even the bankers had to be taught the objections to the bill. Representatives of the American Bankers' Association came into my office and asked for three weeks to study the bill, saying that they did not understand it, but they got a complete understanding of it between my office and the Western Union Telegraph office, where they went and deluged the country with telegrams urging the killing of a bill which they had told me an hour or two before they did not understand.

Mr. KEAN and Mr. BLAINE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BORAH in the chair). Does the Senator from Virginia yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. GLASS. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey, who rose first.

Mr. KEAN. The Senator says that in his home town there is a large shoe manufacturer.

Mr. GLASS. The largest east of the Mississippi and south of the Potomac; not one but several.

Mr. KEAN. Who can not borrow money in his own town.

Mr. GLASS. I did not say that. They can borrow all the money in my town the banks are authorized under the law to lend, but they are not authorized under the law to lend them enough.

Mr. KEAN. The Senator says they have to go to Boston to borrow the money.

Mr. GLASS. They do not have to go there. They do go there or to New York.

Mr. KEAN. Why do they not go to Richmond? I can not see why they can not borrow it just as well in Richmond as they could in Boston.

Mr. GLASS. If Richmond had a branch bank, they might borrow it there more readily and certainly in larger amounts and possibly at a smaller rate of discount than they could borrow from the local banks.

Mr. KEAN. But not cheaper than they could in Boston?

Mr. GLASS. Perhaps not.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator included in his category of States my own State.

Mr. GLASS. Yes; I have a lot of telegrams from Wisconsin.

Mr. BLAINE. Does the Senator know the type of men who have asked for branch banking in Wisconsin?

Mr. GLASS. I have told the Senator I did not take enough interest in the telegrams to read them.

Mr. BLAINE. May I inform the Senator that the only banks in Wisconsin which desire branch banking are the very small group of large banks that want to obtain absolute control of the banking facilities of Wisconsin?

Mr. GLASS. Perhaps that is so in Wisconsin. As I pointed out, my observation and experience have taught me that the banker who does not want a branch bank in his town is the real monopolist. He is the exclusionist.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. In addition to every other consideration which the able Senator has submitted, is it not a fact that we are in an emergent situation in which many communities are calculated to be devoid of any banking facilities whatsoever except as they have them through a branch bank?

Mr. GLASS. The comptroller has pointed out to us that there are thousands of communities in the United States that are now destitute of all banking facilities. I personally know of them in my own State. The largest tobacco producing county in Virginia, and perhaps in the world, has not any banking facilities. Its three banks in this awful depression have failed. Nearly $3,000,000 of deposits are tied up in the hands of receivers and God only knows when any of the depositors will ever get a dollar of their money.

Mr. VANDENBERG. And there is no local capital to replace it.

Mr. GLASS. O Mr. President, these little pawnshops that call themselves "banks"! Here [indicating] is a chart showing the banks in one State of the West in 1920, enough of them, if they were real banks, to supply the United States. Those which have survived, and they are too many, are shown by this other chart. That condition applies not merely to one section of the country. It is just a startling illustration of the utter inefficiency of these inconsequential "pawnshops" which are chartered.

When they begin to fail, the psychology of the thing is quite as disastrous as the failure of a large bank. When small banks fail, the failure begins to create fear in the depositors of the large banks and the consequence is a run on the large banks and the withdrawal of deposits and the breakdown of the whole credit system of the section.

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. Are the charts which the Senator has just exhibited in such form that they may be made a part of the RECORD?

Mr. GLASS. Oh, no.

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. They seem to be quite an interesting exhibit.

Mr. GLASS. I do not think they should be made a part of the RECORD. They are not complete for the country. They relate to certain States and I do not care to be responsible for bringing those States under criticism, and therefore I purposely did not say to what States they relate.

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. Very well.

Mr. GLASS. Credit, except for its delicate nature and its more important nature, is not different from anything else involved in business or in trade. Under sound restrictions I am totally unable to comprehend the objection to having any bank in my State, if it has the facilities, sell its credit in any part of the State. I would not advocate nation-wide branch banking. The species of branch banking which I am advocating now would tend to break down the existing species of nation-wide branch banking without any responsibility whatever or any care of the local interests involved.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. When the Senator addressed himself to this feature of the matter a while ago I was curious to learn why it is that a member bank, which has opportunity to get from the Federal reserve bank whatever credit it is entitled to, should put itself in a state of involuntary servitude to one of the large central banks.

Mr. GLASS. Had the Senator heard me yesterday he would have learned that when, in passing the Federal reserve act, we withdrew the reserve trust funds of the country from the money centers, we had hoped that the banks in involuntary servitude to the money centers would realize that they no longer were compelled to resort to those banks, but might with perfect liberty exercise their privilege to have their eligible paper rediscounted at their respective reserve banks; but they have maintained this alliance. They call it "traditional." They say these bankers are their friends. In fact, they are their masters and not their friends.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. GLASS. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I think I realize the importance of the question asked by the Senator from Montana; but, as I understand it, one of the objects of the Federal reserve act was to free these banks from involuntary servitude, but they have remained in that state of slavery, so the Senator ought not to call it "involuntary." It is voluntary servitude now.

Mr. GLASS. It is involuntary in the sense that they either do not realize their possible independence or they prefer to maintain their traditional business relations and practices with those banks who in past years have accommodated them. The requirement always is that in order to maintain that relationship they must keep on deposit a certain percentage of their funds.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Is it not also a fact that many of the banks were not able to borrow from the Federal reserve bank because the paper which they could discount was limited, and in many of the communities where these banks do business they did not have that kind of paper and so they had to go to what is called the correspondent bank with what collateral they had and borrow money there?

Mr. GLASS. Oh, no; that is scarcely measurably true. In the first place, I can not conceive of any limitation upon the eligible paper of a bank doing a commercial business under the terms of the Federal reserve act. Any paper that has for its purpose an agricultural, commercial, or industrial business transaction, any note, bill of exchange, or other paper, the proceeds of which are intended to be used for these purposes, is eligible at a Federal reserve bank.

One reason why these banks prefer to keep the required deposit at their correspondent bank in the money centers is that they do not want to put themselves to the inappreciable trouble of assembling their eligible paper and rediscounting at a Federal reserve bank. They prefer to make a straight note and get an accommodation readily from their correspondent bank in the large money centers.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. May I ask another question before the Senator from Nebraska interrupts?

Mr. NORRIS. Very well.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Of course I do not refer to banks doing a commercial business. In many of the States, or in many parts of many of the States, there is very little of what is called commercial paper in the banks.

Mr. GLASS. Oh, no; the statistics of the Federal Reserve Board have proved that that is not true. They had $8,500,000,000 and have now that much of rediscountable paper, and they were rediscounting to an inappreciable extent.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I am talking about banks who do not have that kind of paper.

Mr. GLASS. The banks that do not have that kind of paper are not commercial banks, and many of them are out of business now, and ought to be out of business. If we do not do something to reform the banking system, many more will be out of business.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I hope the Senator will pardon me. I am trying to bring to his attention the fact that in agricultural communities there are banks that are not what we call city commercial banks.

Mr. GLASS. But agriculture has a preferred position under the requirements of the Federal reserve act. If you are a merchant you can get accommodated for only 90 days. If you are a farmer you can get accommodated for nine months.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. On what kind of paper?

Mr. GLASS. On agricultural paper; on paper the proceeds of which have been used for agricultural purposes, or the intention is that they shall be used for agricultural purposes. Oh, no; there is plenty of commercial paper. In its bulletin of only March last the Federal Reserve Board reasserted that fact and added that it was adequately distributed throughout the country. The banks are simply not making loans.

Mr. VANDENBERG. And is it not a part of our difficulty that we mingle commercial and savings bank business generally throughout the country?

Mr. GLASS. Undoubtedly, and one large part of it is that we do not require the separation of investment banking from commercial banking.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. GLASS. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I sought to interrupt the Senator a while ago when the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] had his attention. It seems to me the Senator is discussing a very important feature of our Federal reserve system. Without being an expert, it was almost shocking to me to realize, as I did some time ago when I got the figures, that there was such a large volume of eligible paper in the possession of the various banks of the country, with a place to go and get some money on it, and that the banks were not availing themselves of that privilege while their depositors and the entire country were crying out for the use of currency.

I can hardly conceive in the first place that the banks are ignorant of the fact that they possess this ability and have this source where they can rediscount their eligible paper. So it has always seemed to me that there must be some reason, which I do not know and which I do not understand, why this condition should exist. Knowing of his wide range of knowledge, I had hoped that the Senator from Virginia during the course of his discussion would enlighten me on that subject.

It is hardly sufficient to say, it seems to me, that the bankers do not know about it, and it is not an answer, as I look at it, to say that although there is a great cry for money the banks are really hoarding it and do not want to lend it, because, if they have eligible paper, which they have, and I, for instance, a farmer or a merchant, presented my note at the bank for a loan, they would not have to take the money out of the funds they have in their vaults but could at once send that note to the Federal reserve bank of which they were a member and get the money for it.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, one of the most embarrassing things to me, as I have already indicated, is to have imputed to me a knowledge of these matters that I do not actually possess. I can not tell the Senator from Nebraska or the Senate why the banks are frightened to death, but I think that is one reason why they are not making loans. They want to get into as liquid a position as they possibly can to meet or avert runs. Then, also, it is fair to the banks to say that there has been such an arrest, such a cessation, of business in this country that the demands are not nearly so extensive or insistent as otherwise would be the case.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator will permit me further, I am not asserting that the banker ought to loan money on a large scale. I have sympathy for him. I suppose I would do the same thing.

Mr. GLASS. I am afraid I should.

Mr. NORRIS. But in this case the banker does not loan his money; as a matter of fact, he merely acts as an intermediary between the man who wants to borrow and the Federal reserve bank. To make the loan would not take a dollar out of his vaults.

Mr. GLASS. The banker loans his depositors' money; and if he be a sound and honest banker, he ought to have and would have constantly in mind the interest of his depositors. It is true that he could replenish his coffers by rediscounting his eligible paper at the Federal reserve bank. Exactly why he does not do it, I can not tell any more than can the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho and Mr. BYRNES addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. GLASS. I yield first to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. Referring to the statement of the Senator relative to the rediscount of paper, what I am about to say applies only to country banks, because I know nothing of the situation in the city banks. What the Senator says about the Federal reserve banks being able to take care of this situation, I think, is true. What he says about the eligibility of the paper, of course, is also true. However, the trouble is that the rules and regulations surrounding the requirements for rediscountable paper make it very difficult for a country bank at the present time to rediscount paper; in fact, but few country banks have any of the $8,500,000,000 of strictly eligible paper for discount under the rules and requirements of the present administration of the act.

Mr. GLASS. The Senator will recall that I put into the RECORD the statement of the Federal reserve authorities showing that under the restrictions to which the Senator refers there were only 91 member banks of the 7,600 that were without eligible paper.

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. I am quite in sympathy with what the Senator says about the bill, but, not to take too much time, I wish to answer the question why the banks do not loan the money when they have the rediscountable paper. Whenever the statement of a country bank is published it is a community affair, and past experience has shown that bankers who were borrowing money have sometimes failed, and the public is afraid of a bank which they think is rediscounting or borrowing money. It should not be so, but it is so. So the banks in the country communities are afraid to show rediscountable paper on their statements. For that reason they do not exercise the privilege that they could exercise, as in many cases they have the paper the Senator mentions.

Mr. GLASS. Right there I am prompted to inject that one reason which appeals to me for the establishment of branch banks is that there are thousands of country banks that have failed, and there are others that are now threatened with failure, not because the bank officials are dishonest, not because the bank officials have consciously been guilty of unsound methods, but because those banks are so inadequately supplied with capital that they can not afford to employ expert bank managers and skillful bank officials. Such a condition would not apply to larger banks having branches in a community where the unit bank is so weak and insipient that it can not possibly respond to the agricultural or commercial demands of its respective communities.

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. I quite agree with the Senator, and I hope Senators will keep in mind all the time the viewpoint not so much of the banker, not so much of the borrower in these communities, but of the poor fellow who has his money on deposit. We must pass legislation here that will make the depositors' money safe. That is the thought that I have.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, bearing upon the question submitted by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], may I inquire of the Senator from Virginia if it might not be at least partially misleading to refer only to the nation-wide total of eligible paper? What I mean is, Is not the vast bulk of such paper calculated to be concentrated in the money centers, and is not the great margin of the liquidity essentially in the money centers?

Mr. GLASS. I can only respond to that by saying that the official of the Federal Reserve Board especially charged with the gathering of statistical information about these matters stated, and the Federal Reserve Board itself stated, that the distribution of eligible paper throughout the country was very adequate.

Mr. VANDENBERG. For example, is it not probable that no bank was given a loan either by the National Credit Corporation or now by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation except as it had first exhausted its eligible paper at the Federal reserve bank?

Mr. GLASS. I do not know that that is at all true with respect to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. Certainly there is nothing in the act creating that corporation making such a requirement. I do not know, furthermore, that anybody knows anything about the National Credit Corporation. We could not even get the president of it by letter, telegram, and long-distance telephone to appear before our committee. I do not know what the requirements of that organization were.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Does not the Senator think that would be a reasonable assumption in looking the field over?

Mr. GLASS. I suppose I am rather impatient and testy when I undertake to refer to the National Credit Corporation. I do not think there was anything reasonable about it.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES. The Senator has made reference to the statement which he inserted in the RECORD during the discussion of the Glass-Steagall bill. I want to say to the Senator that because the statement was so interesting, I secured from the Federal Reserve Board the figures as of April the 27th, and they confirm the statement made by the Senator a few moments ago that eligible paper is still distributed throughout the various districts. However, the statement shows that the borrowings on April 27 were $106,472,000 less than at the time of the previous report. So the statement made by the Senator from Virginia during the consideration of the Glass-Steagall bill is borne out entirely that so far as the eligible paper is concerned, there was no lack of commercial paper or of United States securities, but there were no borrowers.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I hope now, unless some Senator has a question to ask, that I may conclude my remarks in rather an orderly way. I have consumed infinitely more time of the Senate than I ever expected I would do.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for just one question?

Mr. GLASS. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEAN. There are some twenty-nine million dollars of deposits in the banks, of which the banks are forced, unwillingly perhaps, to keep from 7 to 10 per cent with the Federal reserve banks. They keep——

Mr. GLASS. No.

Mr. KEAN. Excuse me for one moment.

Mr. GLASS. Well, I wanted to stop the Senator at the first misstatement of fact.

Mr. KEAN. The Senator says they have $8,000,000,000 of paper eligible for rediscount. If they had 35 per cent of their deposits, they ought to have $9,100,000,000.

Mr. GLASS. As a matter of fact, they are not required to keep the sum the Senator from New Jersey says they are, because of their shiftiness. It will be recalled that some years ago we reduced the reserve requirement behind time deposits to 3 per cent, but our information was that about 85 per cent of the bankers have so manipulated their deposits as to transfer their demand deposits to their time deposits in order to get the benefit of that 3 per cent. That is not honest banking. It takes us back to what was the outstanding incident of the money trust investigation when Mr. Untermyer was cross-examining a great banker and asked him if the banks in the money centers did not consistently try to evade the law, and the very frank and notable response was: "Why, certainly; what do you suppose we hire the best legal talent in the world for?"

Mr. President, the committee's study of the banking situation showed us conclusively that the system of banking in the rural communities had broken down largely through causes beyond the control of individual bankers or of the community interests. These causes are of a basic nature and have many ramifications, brought about through economic and social changes which have occurred in the United States since 1914; and in a large part the economic movement of a large number of independent local utility and industrial operating units toward a stronger and more centralized form of operation in the large cities has curtailed the opportunities of the country bank for diversity and extension of business, while broadening these opportunities for the large city banks.

Senators know that we have in this country hundreds of 1-crop banks, so to speak. The diversity of their business is inappreciable; and if that one crop fails, the bank fails. That would not so actually apply to a branch-banking system. A large bank in the cotton territory would be very much more apt to have a diversity of business than a weak bank in a small community of that territory; so that when the cotton crop in the far South, or the tobacco crop in Virginia, the Carolinas, Tennessee, and Kentucky fails, it does not necessarily follow that the bank in the larger community, with greater resources, would fail, as so often now occurs with the small banks in small communities.

Two fundamental causes are at the root of the small bank failures—lack of diversity and necessarily lack of earning power. Most of the small banks are what may be termed, as I have stated, 1-crop or 1-enterprise banks. Where the loans of a bank are made to the community which depends upon cotton, and cotton prices are low, or a crop fails, the bank is unable to stand the shock, and the amount of losses can not be absorbed, due to the lack of earnings, and it eventually fails. And so if it is in a tobacco community; so if it is in a coal-mining section.

Many of the banks in the coal-mining section of the country have failed because coal mining has been tremendously arrested, and people who own coal-mining stocks have been literally impoverished. They no longer are getting any dividends. My own small town of 45,000 inhabitants has many million dollars invested in coal stocks, and not one of them is now paying a dividend; and if the banks of that community had to depend upon the coal-mining business they would all fail.

During the 5-year period from 1926 to 1930, inclusive, for which figures have been compiled for national banks, of the banks with total loans and discounts of $150,000 or less, 35 per cent lost money; 28 per cent of the banks with loans and discounts from $150,000 to $250,000 lost money; 20.6 per cent of the banks with loans and discounts from $250,000 to $500,000 lost money; 14.6 per cent of the banks with loans and discounts from half a million dollars to $750,000 lost money; and 13.2 per cent of the banks with loans and discounts from $750,000 to $1,000,000 lost money, according to the figures supplied me by the Comptroller of the Currency. These are small banks; and if we included the year 1931, which was an abnormal year, the figures would show an enormous increase in losses; and as I have pointed out, we have thousands of communities in this country now that are absolutely destitute of banking facilities.

If we had branch-bank authorization, the strong banks that have survived this catastrophe could open up their branches in those communities and afford them not sparse but ample credit facilities—banks sound, expertly managed, with the full responsibility of stockholders' liability. As it is these communities are without banking facilities, and they are unable to raise sufficient capital in the communities to organize unit banks.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, would the Senator mind yielding for a question?

Mr. GLASS. Not at all, sir.

Mr. KEAN. I am sorry to interrupt the Senator again.

Mr. GLASS. The Senator need not express any regret. I am glad to be interrupted.

Mr. KEAN. All I wanted to ask was this: The Senator does not mean to say that the banks with $100,000,000 of capital did not lose money during 1931, does he?

Mr. GLASS. No; I do not mean to say that. I pointed out yesterday that one particular bank with more than $100,000,000 of capital lost for its depositors $18,000,000, and its affiliate lost $57,000,000, making a total of $75,000,000; but that was an exceptional case, it is to be hoped.

I say, Mr. President, that it is the duty of Congress to supply these thousands of communities that are now without banking facilities with those facilities that may be afforded by a sound branch-banking system.

Moreover, the Comptroller of the Currency points out that there are hundreds, if not thousands, of communities in the United States where banks have become so weakened by this frightful depression as to make it improbable that they can much longer stand alone. Under the branch-banking system provided by this bill, hundreds if not thousands of these weak banks might be taken over by strong banks, and their activities and usefulness continued as branches of the strong banks. Who that desires credit, who that needs and is seeking banking accommodations objects to that? I have never known a business man or a merchant to raise an objection. Only the little banker who wants a monopoly of his territory objects.

There is interposed here the suggestion that a bank having a branch in a distant community of its State can not altogether sympathize with the requirements of that community and would not so readily respond to the commercial and industrial demands upon it. Why would it be there, what would it have a branch there for, except to do business, and to do all the business that its resources would permit it to do? I grant you that it might be that the sound and sensible man or men in charge of a branch would not be so eager to grant favors and privileges arising out of personal contact and friendly association; but that would be to the credit of the management rather than to the detriment of the community. How many banks have failed utterly because of that sort of favoritism, and because of unbusinesslike loans made for the accommodation of bank officials themselves, or their personal friends?

That is no argument against a sound system of branch banking. The comptroller assures me that hundreds of banks might have been saved in this exigency—and that is a mild statement of the case—might have been saved and taken over by the stronger banks if we had had a branch-banking system; and he points out to me a very significant fact:

When the Congress granted that inappreciable measure of branch banking which is contained in the so-called McFadden bill, the most strenuous opposition came from the bankers in Chicago outside the loop. They hired a skillful and persuasive professional lobbyist and paid him a high salary to come here to Washington—worse than that, they hired some Congressmen, to my positive documentary knowledge—to oppose even that small measure of branch banking. They extolled the unit-banking system to the skies in preference. Yet, in 1931, there were 70 unit-bank failures outside the loop at Chicago, whereas if we had had a larger measure of branch banking many of these banks, failing not because of the dishonesty or perhaps incapacity of the bank officials, might have been taken over and saved and their depositors rescued from impoverishment.

I referred at the beginning of my remarks to-day to the situation in Canada. I stated from recollection that there had been but 26 bank failures in 65 years of the branch-banking system of Canada.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GLASS. Just as soon as I finish this thought. I also pointed out that the chief significance of the figures furnished me by the comptroller's office was that the total losses from bank failures in Canada in 65 years amounted to but $13,500,000, and that since 1900 there had been but 9 failures, 5 being of small banks carrying deposits of less than a million dollars, and that 5 of the 9 failures were so managed that the depositors in the banks did not lose a dollar, because the large banks in concert took them over and saved the depositors.

I now yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. BLAINE. I wanted to inquire of the Senator whether or not, in view of the fact that for 200 miles in Canada along the Canadian border there are natural resources, agricultural possibilities, the Great Lakes, transportation, and possibilities of industrial development, he would explain Canada's backwardness as compared with the United States in commerce, agriculture, and industry, as due to its branch-banking system?

Mr. GLASS. No; I do not think its backwardness is due to the branch-bankink system. I think if it had not been for its branch-bank system, with a record such as I have described, its backwardness would have been infinitely greater than it has been. But I am not undertaking to describe the industrial backwardness of Canada, or of any other country. I am simply undertaking to show that the banking system has been sound, and that it has not resulted in tremendous losses to the depositors.

Mr. BLAINE. Is it not a fact that leading Canadians and publicists of Canada claim that the concentration of credit and banking under the branch-banking system of Canada has been directly responsible for the lack of development in agriculture, industry, and commerce in Canada?

Mr. GLASS. I have not seen anything to that effect; but I recall very vividly that when we enacted the Federal reserve act we had before our committee Sir Edmund Walker, at that time the head of the Canadian banking system, and his unqualified defense of their banking system was to me exhilarating. It almost converted me from my fixed judgment to the contrary at the time, and I have since many times regretted that I did not yield to his urgency.

I want to say this, too, that prior to the Civil War the two best banking systems in the United States were the branch-banking systems of Indiana and Virginia. Their notes were at a premium in every State of the Union.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish the Senator would enlighten me on this subject. In speaking of the number of banks which failed in Canada, does the Senator mean that so many branch banks or so many banks with branches failed?

Mr. GLASS. Banks with branches.

Mr. NORRIS. I can not conceive of a branch failing under that system.

Mr. GLASS. Oh, no; the branch can not fail. If the parent bank fails, of course it carries the branch along with it. But, as I have tried to point out, it is not so much in the number of banks which have failed but the small losses to the depositors which have ensued.

Mr. NORRIS. I realize that. Nevertheless, I wanted to get the number if I could. If we count each branch a bank—and it seems to me we ought to do that when we compare them with our unit bank—how many would that mean?

Mr. GLASS. I have not those figures, frankly. I feel so thoroughly convinced that a large measure of the usefulness of this proposed reformation of the banking system is involved in this branch banking that I have presented the matter with as much urgency and force as I have been able to command.

I want to conclude this discussion of the branch-banking feature by again insisting to the Senate that no question of State rights is involved. The matter of the right of Congress to go into a State without its consent and establish a national-bank system, and even to deprive the State, as it were, of the right of taxation, except by consent of Congress; the fact that Congress went into the State and prohibited, under a species of taxation, the issuance of currency by State banks; and the significant and conclusive fact that there is nothing in this provision of the bill, or in any other provision of the bill, which would undertake to interfere in the slightest degree with the State exercising its sovereign power by conferring the right to establish branches on State banks, show that that is not a tenable objection, though a very plausible, and, to some people, persuasive one.

I am a State-rights Democrat. I believe in the Jeffersonian theory of State rights, and of revenue tariff, in contradistinction to some of my colleagues, to whom Jefferson would not speak if he should meet them on the highway. I believe in State rights. But no State rights is involved in this question, because the State is not precluded from putting its State banks on a level of competition with national banks should they avail themselves of a privilege proposed to be granted.

It is not compulsory. No national bank must establish a branch if it does not think the community needs it and desires it, and does not believe there is a profitable business there for a branch. It is a purely voluntary thing.

I would like to impress those Senators who have done me the honor to listen to me with that contention, that it is not a question of ruthlessly disregarding the right of any State, because any State has within itself the power to avert any inequitable or unfair competition which might be involved in behalf of national banks.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator one further question?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. In section 19, this privilege of establishing a branch, I apprehend, is limited in each instance to the approval of the Federal Reserve Board?

Mr. GLASS. Yes; just as the right to charter a national bank now resides in the Comptroller of the Currency here at Washington.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I assume it would not be a rash presumption that, in the exercise of this optional power, the Federal Reserve Board would prevent any competitive raid on a banking system in a community where adequate banking facilities exist?

Mr. GLASS. Undoubtedly; the Federal Reserve Board would feel the obligation was upon it not to invade any community with a branch national bank if the existing banks afforded adequate credits. That is presumptively the obligation of the Comptroller of the Currency now. Not longer than three weeks ago he rejected the insistent demands of responsible men in a rich community of Virginia desiring to charter a national bank, giving as the reason that the one State bank there in the community was equal to all the requirements of the situation. It is not to be supposed that if this bill becomes a law the Federal Reserve Board is going out and authorize branch banking by the wholesale.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Pursuing the implication of my question and the implication of the Senator's answer, would the Senator think that it was a dangerous limitation upon this branch-bankink power if the creation of the branches were limited to the taking over of existing unit or affiliate banks in a given community, except in the case where the community has no banking service whatever?

Mr. GLASS. I would not call it a dangerous limitation. It might not be regarded by the Banking and Currency Committee precisely as a desirable limitation.

I may say to the Senator that a suggestion somewhat akin to that cited by him was made to the committee. It was that we provide that no branch might be established in a community unless the parent bank proposing to establish a branch should first negotiate with the existing unit bank or banks to take it or them over. But the committee did not agree that that was a wise restriction, and we did not incorporate it in the bill.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I suggest, somewhat in line with the remark of the Senator from Michigan, that the banks now having affiliates in different States would prefer themselves that they be branches instead of affiliates, that they would like to dispose of their affiliates, if they were permitted to establish branches?

Mr. GLASS. I think some of them wish they had disposed of their affiliates long, long ago. Yet there are some who are violently railing against this bill because we propose over a period of years to separate affiliates from national banks.

I do trust that Senators will read the legal opinion of Frederick W. Lehmann, to which I made reference yesterday, and which the Senate authorized to be printed as a public document. It will be available in print to-morrow.

I spoke of it yesterday from recollection without having the opinion before me. I made the inaccurate statement, because it had been made to me, as I conceived, authoritatively, that it was not the opinion of the Attorney General, but simply the opinion of the Solicitor General. But, upon examining the opinion itself when I returned to my office, I found that it was also the opinion of the Attorney General, Mr. Wickersham, because Mr. Lehmann states in the second paragraph of his letter of November 6, 1911:

On August 1, 1911, I submitted to you an opinion in which you concurred that the agreement and arrangement in question were means of enabling the banks to carry on business and exercise powers prohibited to it by the national banking act.

So that it will appear from the language thus used that this was not merely the opinion of the Solicitor General but it was an opinion concurred in by the Attorney General. Why it was not acted on, why the Comptroller of the Currency, having supervision and control under the law of the national banking system, was not supplied with this opinion for his guidance, why it apparently disappeared from the face of the earth and could only be found in its original form, of which I have been furnished a photostatic copy, is something that I can only conjecture.

In this connection I have just been handed a note from Attorney General Mitchell in which he makes the statement, which I had already discovered to be true, that it was not former Attorney General McReynolds who refused to give out this opinion for publication, but it was former Attorney General Palmer. I did not on yesterday state which Attorney General it was. Perhaps I said enough to indicate that one might easily guess it was Attorney General McReynolds, and I felt authorized to do that because the memorandum of the present Attorney General specifically and textually stated it was Mr. McReynolds. He now calls attention to the fact, which I had already noted, that since it happened in 1921 it could not have been Attorney General McReynolds, because he was then on the Supreme Court Bench. It was Palmer and not McReynolds, according to Attorney General Mitchell's note just now handed to me.

The note of the Attorney General, which is not personal, states that his files show that in 1913 Attorney General McReynolds, at the request of Secretary McAdoo, gave the latter—that is to say, Secretary McAdoo—a copy of the Lehmann opinion. I do not know what Secretary McAdoo did with it, but I know what ought to have been done with it when it was written and concurred in by the Attorney General. It ought to have been supplied to the Comptroller of the Currency. It seems to me that, fortified with an opinion of that sort, the Comptroller of the Currency, whoever he may have been at that time, was under obligation to break up these illicit practices and the establishment by national banks of affiliates.

Of course, the present Comptroller of the Currency is not involved in any criticism that may be implied by what I have said. The distinguished Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES], my very devoted friend, suggested yesterday that I did not do anything about it when I was Secretary of the Treasury. It was not, strictly speaking, any of my business to do anything about it. The Comptroller of the Currency is supposed to be, but is not always, independent of the Secretary of the Treasury; but had I known anything about it perhaps I would have gone out of my jurisdiction and had something to say about it, as I have had now.

EXHIBIT A

[Senate Document No. 92, Seventy-second Congress, first session]

LEGALITY OF CERTAIN AGREEMENTS CONCERNING HOLDINGS OF NATIONAL-BANK STOCK

Mr. GLASS presented the following opinion of Solicitor General Lehmann submitted to the Attorney General on November 6, 1911, relative to the legality of certain agreements and arrangements as to holdings of national-bank stocks:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, D. C., November 6, 1911.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL.

SIR: You advise me that the President desires that there shall be submitted to him upon his return to Washington a fuller discussion of the question of the legality of the agreements and arrangements existing between the ——— ——— Bank of New York and the ——— ——— Co., a corporation of the State of New York.

On August 1, 1911, I submitted to you an opinion, in which you concurred, that the agreements and arrangements in question were means of enabling the bank to carry on business and exercise powers prohibited to it by the national banking act.

I have reconsidered the question with the care demanded by its importance, and have reached the conclusion that both the bank and the company, whether considered as affiliated or as unrelated, are in violation of the law.

At the outset it is well to consider the purposes which the framers of the national banking act had in view. The first, the paramount, purpose was to secure a uniform national system of currency, and to do this without the creation of a great central institution like the old United States Bank.

The opposition to such an institution was deep-seated and widespread, and the sponsors of the various plans which took final shape in the national banking act were careful to point out that the objections to the United States Bank had been duly considered and had been avoided by them.

In August, 1861, O. B. Potter, of New York, submitted to the Secretary of the Treasury a scheme to permit State banks and bankers to issue notes secured by United States bonds, saying: "None of the objections justly urged against a United States bank lie against this plan. It gives to the Government no power to bestow favors and does not place a dollar in its hands to lend. * * * It is impossible to see how such a system can be made use of for political ends." (The Origin of the National Banking System, S. Doc. No. 582, pp. 46–48, 61st Cong., 2d sess.)

Samuel Hooper, a Member of the House from Massachusetts, was an active agent in the attainment of the end sought. In support of one of the early measures proposed, which, while it did not become a law, was a step in that direction, he said:

"Thus are secured all the benefits of the old United States Bank without many of those objectionable features which aroused opposition. It was affirmed that, by its favors, the Government enabled that bank to monopolize the business of the country. Here no such system of favoritism exists. * * * It was affirmed that frequently great inconvenience and sometimes terrible disaster resulted to the trade and commerce of different localities by the mother bank of the United States arbitrarily interfering with the management of the branches by reducing suddenly their loans and sometimes withdrawing large amounts of their specie for political effect. Here each bank transacts its own business upon its own capital, and is subject to no demands except those of its own customers and its own business. It will be as if the Bank of the United States had been divided into many parts, and each part endowed with the life, motion, and similitude of the whole, revolving on its own orbit, managed by its own board of directors, attending to the business interests of its own locality; and yet to the bills of each will be given as wide a circulation and as fixed a value as were given to those of the Bank of the United States in its palmiest days." (Congressional Globe, 37th Cong., 2d sess., Pt. I, p. 616.)

In the national banking act as passed in 1863 it was believed that the desired result had been obtained.

Mr. Hugh McCulloch, president of a leading bank at Indianapolis, and distinguished as a financier, was induced, at great sacrifice to himself, to accept the office of Comptroller of the Currency and inaugurate the new system. In a letter to a friend published in the Banker's Magazine, Vol. XVIII, pages 8 and 9, he said:

"The national system of banking has been devised with a wisdom that reflects the highest credit upon its author to furnish to the people of the United States a national-bank note circulation without the agency of a national bank. It is not to be a mammoth corporation, with power to increase and diminish its discounts and circulation, at the will of its managers, thus enabling a board of directors to control the business and politics of the country. It can have no concentrated political power. Nor do I see how it can be diverted from its proper and legitimate objects for partisan purposes. It will concentrate in the hands of no privileged persons a monopoly of banking. It simply authorizes, under suitable and necessary restrictions, any number of persons, not less than five in number, in any of the States or Territories of the Union, to engage in the business of banking, while it prevents them from issuing a single dollar to circulate as money which is not secured by the stocks and resources of the Government. It is, therefore, in my judgment (as far as calculation is regarded), not only a perfectly safe system of banking, but it is one that is eminently adapted to the nature of our political institutions."

In his first report as Comptroller of Currency, made November 28, 1863, he says:

"By the national currency act the principle is for the first time recognized and established that the redemption of bank notes should be guaranteed by the Government authorizing their issue. The national currency will be as solvent as the nation of which it represents the unity. The country has at last secured to it a permanent paper circulating medium of a uniform value, without the aid of a national bank. This national system confers no monopoly of banking, but opens its advantages equally to all. It interferes with no State rights. It meets both the necessities of the Government and the wants of the people. It needs modifications, and may require others than those which are suggested in this report; but it is right in principle, and of its success there can, I think, be no reasonable doubt.

"This examination of the act, and the observation of the manner in which it is being administered, have resulted in the entering up of a popular judgment in favor of the national-banking system: A judgment, not that the system is a perfect one, nor free from danger of abuse, but that it is a safer system, better adapted to the nature of our political institutions, and to our commercial necessities, giving more strength to the Government, with less risk of its being used by the Government against the just rights of the States, or the rights of the people, than any system which has yet been devised, and that by such amendments of the act as experience may show to be needful, it may be made as little objectionable and as beneficial to the Government and the people as any paper-money banking system that wisdom and experience are likely to invent. It promises to give to the people that longexisting 'desideratum,' a national currency without a national bank, a bank-note circulation of uniform value without the creation of a moneyed power in a few hands over the politics and business of the country."

And again in his second report, made November 25, 1864.

When in his letter and reports Mr. McCulloch speaks of "a national bank-note circulation without the agency of a national bank," etc., he manifestly has reference to an institution national in the sense of being a central institution like the old United States Bank, operating throughout the country by means of branches.

The banks created by the national banking act were, and were designed to be, local institutions and independent of each other, but under national control and supervision. Nationalization without centralization was the keynote of the law. This is demonstrated by the structure of the banks provided for.

Reference will be made to the national banking act as contained in the United States Compiled Statutes, 1901. It is title 62, and consists of four chapters. The first chapter deals with "organization and powers," the second with "obtaining and issuing circulating notes," the third with "regulation of the banking business," and the fourth with "dissolution and receivership." The entire act is too long for reproduction here, but pertinent sections will be set out in full or in their substance.

Section 5133, "formation of national banking associations," provides:

"Associations for carrying on the business of banking under this title may be formed by any number of natural persons, not less in any case than five. They shall enter into articles of association, which shall specify in general terms the object for which the association is formed, and may contain any other provisions, not inconsistent with law, which the association may see fit to adopt for the regulation of its business and the conduct of its affairs. These articles shall be signed by the persons uniting to form the association, and a copy of them shall be forwarded to the Comptroller of the Currency, to be filed and preserved in his office."

It should be noted in passing that only "natural persons" may engage in the formation of a bank.

Section 5134, "requisites of organization certificate," provides:

"The persons uniting to form such an association shall, under their hands, make an organization in certificate, which shall specifically state:

"First. The name assumed by such association, which name shall be subject to the approval of the Comptroller of the Currency.

"Second. The place where its operations of discount and deposit are to be carried on, designating the State, Territory, or District, and the particular county and city, town or village.

"Third. The amount of capital stock and the number of shares into which the same is to be divided.

"Fourth. The names and places of residence of the shareholders and the number of shares held by each of them.

"Fifth. The fact that the certificate is made to enable such persons to avail themselves of the advantages of this title."

By this section the bank is distinctly localized, for it requires that "the place where its operations of discount and deposits are to be carried on" shall be designated as to State, county and city, town or village, and it allows but one place.

This is repeated in section 5190, "place of business," which provides:

"The usual business of each national banking association shall be transacted at an office or banking house located in the place specified in its organization certificate."

By an act of May 1, 1886 (ch. 73, 24 Stat. 18), a bank was authorized to change its location, but not to a place more than 30 miles distant, and the new location must be within the same State. No provision has ever been made for increasing the number of cities, towns, or villages in which a bank may do business.

Section 5138, "requisite amount of capital," provides:

"No association shall be organized with a less capital than $100,000, except that banks with a capital of not less than $50,000 may, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, be organized in any place the population of which does not exceed 6,000 inhabitants, and except that banks with a capital of not less than $25,000 may, with the sanction of the Secretary of the Treasury, be organized in any place the population of which does not exceed 3,000 inhabitants. No association shall be organized in a city the population of which exceeds 50,000 persons with a capital of less than $200,000."

This, because of the small amount of capital required in such case, extends the facilities of national banking to the smallest communities.

Section 5146, "requisite qualifications of directors," provides:

"Every director must, during his whole term of service, be a citizen of the United States, and at least three-fourths of the directors must have resided in the State, Territory, or District in which the association is located, for at least one year immediately preceding their election, and must be residents therein during their continuance of office. Every director must own, in his own right, at least 10 shares of the capital stock of the association of which he is a director. Any director who ceases to be the owner of 10 shares of the stock, or who becomes in any other manner disqualified, shall thereby vacate his place."

Here the local character of the bank is secured. The directors must all be shareholders, they must all be citizens of the United States and three-fourths of them must be residents of the State.

The powers of the bank are conferred in general terms by section 5136, and they are, to have a seal, and perpetual succession, to make contracts, sue and be sued, elect officers and define their duties, and further—

"Sixth. To prescribe, by its board of directors, by-laws not inconsistent with law, regulating the manner in which its stock shall be transferred, its directors elected or appointed, its officers appointed, its property transferred, its general business conducted, and the privileges granted to it by law exercised and enjoyed.

"Seventh. To exercise by its board of directors, or duly authorized officers or agents, subject to law, all such incidental powers as shall be necessary to carry on the business of banking; by discounting and negotiating promissory notes, drafts, bills of exchange, and other evidence of debt; by receiving deposits; by buying and selling exchange, coin, and bullion; by loaning money on personal security; and by obtaining, issuing, and circulating notes according to the provisions of this title.

"But no association shall transact any business except such as is incidental and necessarily preliminary to its organization, until it has been authorized by the Comptroller of the Currency to commence this business of banking."

Section 5137 confers power to hold real property and limits it to such as may be necessary for "its immediate accommodation in the transaction of its business," and such as it may acquire in the way of securing payment of debts previously contracted, but real estate so acquired can not be held for a longer period than five years.

Section 5197 limits the rate of interest which may be taken to that "allowed by the laws of the State, Territory, or District where the bank is located."

This again emphasizes the local character of the institution.

Section 5201 prohibits a bank from loaning upon or purchasing its own shares.

It has been repeatedly held that the powers of a national bank are limited to those expressly granted by the act and such as are properly incidental to those granted.

In Logan County National Bank v. Townsend (139 U. S. 67, l. c. 75), the court, speaking through Mr. Justice Harlan, said:

"It is undoubtedly true, as contended by the defendant, that the national banking act is an enabling act for all associations organized under it, and that a national bank can not rightfully exercise any powers except those expressly granted by that act, or such incidental powers as are necessary to carry on the business of banking for which it was established. The statute declares that a national banking institution shall have power 'to exercise, by its board of directors, or duly authorized officers or agents, subject to law, all such incidental powers as shall be necessary to carry on the business of banking; by discounting and negotiating promissory notes, drafts, bills of exchange, and other evidences of debt; by receiving deposits; by buying and selling exchange, coin, and bullion; by loaning money on personal security; and by obtaining, issuing, and circulating notes according to the provisions' of title 62 of the Revised Statutes."

And in California Bank v. Kennedy (167 U. S. 362, l. c. 366) the court, through Mr. Justice White, said:

"It it settled that the United States statutes relative to national banks constitute the measure of the authority of such corporations, and that they can not rightfully exercise any powers except those expressly granted, or which are incidental to carrying on the business for which they are established. Logan County Bank v. Townsend (139 U. S. 67, 73). No express power to acquire the stock of another corporation is conferred upon a national bank; but it has been held that, as incidental to the power to loan money on personal security, a bank may in the usual course of doing such business accept stock of another corporation as collateral, and by the enforcement of its rights as pledgee it may become the owner of the collateral and be subject to liability as other stockholders. National Bank v. Case (99 U. S. 628). So, also, a national bank may be conceded to possess the incidental power to accept in good faith stock of another corporation as security for a previous indebtedness. It is clear, however, that a national bank does not possess the power to deal in stocks. The prohibition is implied from the failure to grant the power. First National Bank v. National Exchange Bank (92 U. S. 122, 128)."

The proposition is an elementary one in corporation law and needs no elaboration.

It follows that while a bank may take the stocks of another corporation as collateral to a loan, or take them in payment of a debt previously incurred, it can not deal in stocks. The limit of its powers in this respect is stated by Chief Justice White in First National Bank v. National Exchange Bank (92 U. S. 122, 128):

"* * * In the honest exercise of the power to compromise a doubtful debt owing to a bank it can hardly be doubted that stocks may be accepted in payment and satisfaction, with a view to their subsequent sale or conversion into money so as to make good or reduce in anticipated loss. Such a transaction would not amount to a dealing in stocks."

In First National Bank v. Converse (200 U. S. 425) a manufacturing company had failed, and the creditors, among whom was the bank, organized a new corporation to purchase the stocks, evidences of debt, and assets of the old, and to continue in the manufacture of the same articles that had been manufactured by the old company. This transaction was held to be without the powers of the bank. The court, page 439, said:

"* * * To concede that a national bank has ordinarily the right to take stock in another corporation as collateral for a present loan or as security for a preexisting debt does not imply that because a national bank has lent money to a corporation it may become an organizer and take stock in a new and speculative ven- ture; in other words, do the very thing which the previous decisions of this court have held can not be done."

As to acquiring the stocks of other national banks, the ruling of the court is very explicit.

In Concord First National Bank v. Hawkins (174 U. S. 364) the bank of Concord, N. H., had bought and held as an investment 100 shares of the stock of the Indianapolis National Bank. The last-named bank failed and Hawkins as receiver sued the Concord bank to recover the assessment which had been made upon the stock of the Indianapolis bank. The Concord bank denied liability upon the grounds that it had no right to hold the stock. The court refused to so much as to apply the doctrine of estoppel in favor of creditors. Referring to previous decisions of the court and to the distinction made by the circuit court between the acquisition of stocks in national banks and of stocks in other corporations, the court, page 368, said:

"No reason is given by the learned judge in support of the solidity of such a distinction, and none occurs to us. Indeed, we think that the reasons which disqualify a national bank from investing its money in the stock of another corporation are quite as obvious when that other corporation is a national bank as in the case of other corporations. The investment by national banks of their surplus funds in other national banks, situated, perhaps, in distant States, as in the present case, is plainly against the meaning and policy of the statutes from which they derive their powers, and evil consequences would be certain to ensue if such a course of conduct were countenanced as lawful. Thus, it is enacted, in section 5146, that "every director must, during his whole term of service, be a citizen of the United States, and at least three-fourths of the directors must have resided in the State, Territory, or District in which the association is located for at least one year immediately preceding their election and must be residents therein during their continuance in office."

"One of the evident purposes of this enactment is to confine the management of each bank to persons who live in the neighborhood, and who may, for that reason, be supposed to know the trustworthiness of those who are to be appointed officers of the bank, and the character and financial ability of those who may seek to borrow its money. But if the funds of a bank in New Hampshire, instead of being retained in the custody and management of its directors, are invested in the stock of a bank in Indiana, the policy of this wholesome provision of the statute would be frustrated. The property of the local stockholders, so far as thus invested, would not be managed by directors of their own selection but by distant and unknown persons. Another evil that might result, if large and wealthy banks were permitted to buy and hold the capital stock of other banks, would be that in that way the banking capital of a community might be concentrated in one concern, and business men be deprived of the advantages that attend competition between banks. Such accumulation of capital would be in disregard of the policy of the national banking law, as seen in its numerous provisions regulating the amount of the capital stock and the methods to be pursued in increasing or reducing it. The smaller banks in such a case would be in fact though not in form branches of the larger one.

"Section 5201 may also be referred to as indicating the policy of this legislation. It is in the following terms:

"'No association shall make any loan or discount on the security of the shares of its own capital stock, nor be the purchaser or holder of any such shares, unless such security or purchase shall be necessary to prevent loss upon a debt previously contracted in good faith; and stock so purchased or acquired shall, within six months from the time of its purchase, be sold or disposed of at public or private sale; or, in default thereof, a receiver may be appointed to close up the business of the association.'

"This provision forbidding a national bank to own and hold shares of its own capital stock would, in effect, be defeated if one national bank were permitted to own and hold a controlling interest in the capital stock of another."

Here is an express recognition and assertion of the local and independent character of our national banks and the denial of any power which would tend to create what is in effect a central bank with branches.

As to the transfer of its shares, a national bank has power only "to prescribe, by its board of directors, by-laws not inconsistent with law, regulating the manner in which its stock shall be transferred." Manner relates to method or form and not to substance. So the by-laws may require a formal indorsement of the outstanding certificate, the issuance of a new one, and a register of the transfer upon the books of the bank. But no condition can be imposed which limits or impairs the right of transfer.

The national banking act, as originally passed in 1863, by section 36, denied to the stockholder "power to sell or transfer any share held in his own right so long as he shall be liable, either as principal debtor, surety, or otherwise, to the association for any debt which shall have become due and remains unpaid," etc.; but this provision was repealed by the act of 1864, which, with amendments, is the act now upon the books. The purpose of the repeal was to make the shares more readily transferable. Banks thereafter, however, attempted to enforce the restrictions of the original act by means of by-laws, but these have been held always to be invalid. Speaking to this subject in Bank v. Lanier, 11 Wall. 369, l. c. 377–378, the court said:

"The power to transfer their stock is one of the most valuable franchises conferred by Congress on banking associations. Without this power it can readily be seen the value of the stock would be greatly lessened, and, obviously, whatever contributes to make the shares of the stock a safe mode of investment, and easily convertible, tends to enhance their value. It is no less the interest of the shareholder than the public that the certificate representing his stock should be in a form to secure public confidence, for without this he could not negotiate it to any advantage.

"It is in obedience to this requirement that stock certificates of all kinds have been constructed in a way to invite the confidence of business men, so that they have become the basis of commercial transactions in all the large cities of the country and are sold in open market the same as other securities. Although neither in form nor character negotiable paper, they approximate to it as nearly as practicable. If we assume that the certificates in question are not different from those in general use by corporations—and the assumption is a safe one—it is easy to see why investments of this character are sought after and relied upon. No better form could be adopted to assure the purchaser that he can buy with safety. He is told, under the seal of the corporation, that the shareholder is entitled to so much stock, which can be transferred on the books of the corporation, in person or by attorney, when the certificates are surrendered, but not otherwise. This is a notification to all persons interested to know that whoever in good faith buys the stock and produces to the corporation the certificates regularly assigned, with power to transfer, is entitled to have the stock transferred to him. And the notification goes further, for it assures the holder that the corporation will not transfer the stock to anyone not in possession of the certificates."

This ruling holding the restrictive by-law to be invalid was repeated in Bullard v. National Eagle Bank (18 Wall. 594), Third National Bank v. Buffalo German Ins. Co. (193 U. S. 581), and in many cases on the circuit and in the State courts.

If the law was changed to permit a transfer, when to deny it was in the immediate interest of the bank, it surely never was the purpose to authorize a restriction upon transfer in behalf of any interest foreign to the bank, and with which it is forbidden that the bank, as a bank, may be identified.

From the history of the national banking act, from its terms and provisions, and from the decisions of the Supreme Court construing it, these propositions are derived:

I. The banks are local institutions and independent of each other, none the less that they are creatures of Federal power and subject to Federal supervision and control.

II. A bank may in its by-laws regulate the manner in which its shares may be transferred, but it can not impair or limit the right of transfer.

III. As to business operations, the bank has such powers as are expressly granted by the act and such as are properly incidental to those expressly granted, and none other, and so can engage only in the business of banking as that business is defined by the act.

IV. It is neither banking nor an incident of banking to invest the funds of the bank in another business in any manner or to any extent; and the bank has, therefore, no right to invest its funds in the stocks of another corporation, and especially not in the stocks of another national bank.

V. The powers of a national banking association are and can be granted only by the United States, and as no grant of such powers is made by the act to any State corporation they may not be exercised by such a corporation.

These propositions relate to matters of substance, and so may be no more evaded than violated. Indirection, if it accomplishes the same purpose, stands upon the same footing with direction.

Coming now to the case in hand, we have to consider what is the practical effect of the creation of the ——— ——— Bank and its affiliation with the ——— ——— Company.

So far as concerns matters of form, it may be conceded that the ——— ——— Bank was incorporated as an independent institution. Still its certificate of incorporation while not compelling dependence upon or interrelation with any other institution does provide for it. Its business powers and capacities are very extensive. They authorize the acquisition of any kind of property and the conduct of any kind of business and the doing of whatever may be incident thereto. (See art. 2 of the certificate of association.) The only limitation upon its business activities is to be found in Paragraph VIII of Article II, and this is:

"* * * but nothing herein contained shall be construed as authorizing the business of banking nor as including the business purpose or purposes of a money corporation or a corporation provided for by the banking, insurance, railroad, and the transportation corporations laws, or an educational institution or corporation which may be incorporated as provided in the education law, nor as authorizing or intending to authorize the performance at any time of any act or acts then unlawful."

As the business of banking, which must be taken to include the business of banking under the national banking laws, is expressly prohibited, the powers of the company as granted by its charter do not offend the Federal laws.

The tenth article provides in its first paragraph that "the directors of the company need not be stockholders," and in the second paragraph that—

"No transaction entered into by the company shall be affected by the fact that the directors of the company were personally interested in it, and every director of the company is hereby relieved from any disability that might otherwise prevent his contracting with the company for the benefit of himself or any firm, association, or corporation in which he may be in anywise interested."

These provisions in and of themselves violate no Federal statutes, but they give a facility for serving two masters, which is, to say the least, unusual; and they do permit the use of the company as a mere instrumentality or convenience of some other institution.

The capital stock of the company is by the third article fixed at $10,000,000, but it is provided by paragraph 5 of article 10 that—

"The board of directors shall have absolute discretion in the declaration of dividends out of the surplus profits of the company, and they may accumulate such profits to such extent as they may deem advisable instead of distributing them among the stockholders, and may invest and reinvest the same in such manner as in their absolute discretion they may deem advisable."

Thus, while there is a limit placed upon the capital stock of the company, there is none upon the actual capital it may accumulate, and so none upon its possible financial power.

These various provisions of the certificate of incorporation are important to be considered in view of the use which has been made of the company.

The certificate is dated July 5, 1911, but prior to that date on June 1, 1911, an agreement was entered into between the ——— ——— Bank as the first party [three names of prominent persons eliminated] trustees, as the second party, and [five names of prominent persons eliminated] and other subscribers, "who are shareholders of the said bank," as parties of the third part. In the agreement these parties are designated, respectively, as "the bank," "the trustees," and "the subscribers."

The trustees are all of them officers of the bank. Mr. ——— is the chairman of the board of directors, Mr. ——— is its president, and Mr. ——— is a director.

The agreement, then, is one between the bank, its officers and its shareholders, and, as will be seen, the officers and shareholders are dealt with not as individuals but as officers and shareholders.

The preamble recites that—

"Opportunities and facilities for making desirable investments, other than those which are possible in the ordinary course of the banking business, are, from time to time presented to the officers of the bank, which they desire to make available to the shareholders of the bank."

Here is the declared purpose to do something, make investments, not within the scope of the bank's powers. That the officers and shareholders of the bank as individuals may make such investments is conceded, but that the bank, or its officers or shareholders, as officers and shareholders, may do so; in other words, that the powers and facilities granted by the national banking act may be used for purposes outside the ordinary course of banking business is denied.

The first article of the agreement provides for the organization of an investing company. It is here called the United States Investing Co. It is, however, the ——— ——— Company under a provisional name.

It is not within the scope of the bank's powers to have part or lot in such an agreement, for the simple reason that the formation of an investing company, under State corporation laws, is not the conduct of banking under national laws. And what is true of the bank is true of its officers and shareholders acting as such.

The second article accords to each shareholder of the bank, as a right, a beneficial interest, through the trustees, in the capital stock of the investing company, to the extent of two-fifths of the par value of his capital stock in the bank, provided he exercises his right by executing the agreement or by having his bank stock stamped as thereafter provided in the agreement. If the shareholder does not exercise his right in time, the trustees may determine the conditions upon which he may do so thereafter.

The par value of the capital stock of the bank is $25,000,000, and two-fifths of this is ten millions, which is the par value of the stock of the investing company. Every shareholder of the bank exercising his right, the stock of the company is fully provided for.

It is contended that the shareholder of the bank is not required to take his allotted beneficial interest in the company, but manifestly he is under strong compulsion. The bank and the company, as will be seen from later provisions of the agreement, are so closely bound together that the welfare of the company will always be the serious concern of the bank. For better or for worse the bank and the company are united. The shareholder, if he is not in the arrangement, must none the less hazard the worse and get none of the better, and so, inasmuch as against his will he is in for the worse, he will in self-protection go in further and entitle himself to the better.

The third article provides that in order to facilitate participation by the shareholders of the bank in the beneficial interests in the company, the trustees will recommend to the directors of the bank the declaration of a special dividend of 40 per cent on the capital stock of the bank, which will amount to $10,000,000, or the exact amount of the capital stock of the company. The subscribers, shareholders of the bank, agree to apply the dividend to the payment of the stock of the company.

The recommendation of the trustees, officers of the bank, assented to by the bank and by two-thirds of the shareholders, was sure to be adopted, but not even as against a dissenting or nonassenting minority, no matter how small that minority might be, was there a right to declare a dividend except as such declaration was made in the interest of the bank and its shareholders as such. And there is a larger interest, that of depositors and of the National Government, which requires that the bank shall be conducted as a bank pure and simple and not as a promoting agency of speculative investment companies.

The fourth article requires that the subscribers at once assign the special dividend to the trustees in order to enable the trustees to organize the investing company.

This only emphasizes the fact that the resources and facilities of the bank were utilized to create the investing company.

The fifth article provides (1) that the stock of the investing company shall be issued to the trustees and shall be held by them and their successors in trust, and (2) that the beneficial interest of the subscribers in this stock "shall not be transferable separately, but only by the transfer of the shares of stock of the bank held by them, respectively, and every sale or transfer of stock of the bank by a subscriber or his successor shall include the beneficial interest of such subscriber or his successor in the capital stock of the investing company attaching to the shares of the bank so sold or transferred."

The first clause of this article limits the number of stockholders in the company to three, the three being the trustees and their successors in trust.

Article 9 of the agreement provides:

"The number of trustees hereunder shall not be less than three. Any trustee may, at any time, resign. In case of any vacancy in the number of trustees, it shall be filled by the remaining trustees by the selection of some one who is an officer or a director of the bank: And any trustee who shall cease to be an officer or a director of the bank shall thereupon also cease to be a trustee hereunder; it being intended that only officers or directors of the bank shall act as trustees.

"No trustee shall be liable for the acts of any other trustee, but shall be liable only for his own willful misconduct.

"The trustees may act by a majority, either at a meeting or by writing with or without a meeting; and they may vote in person or by proxy."

Thus only officers or directors of the bank can ever be stockholders in the company, for the trustees hold the stock and only officers and directors of the bank can be trustees. And the trustees are a self-perpetuating body. Any vacancy is to be filled by the remaining trustees.

By article 8 it is provided that the trustees and such other persons as they may designate, who shall be officers or directors of the bank, shall constitute the first board of directors of the company, and that no one shall ever be a director of the company who is not also an officer or director of the bank.

The certificate of incorporation of the company provides for five directors, but it has only three stockholders; therefore it was provided in the certificate that directors need not be stockholders.

The second clause of article 5 prohibits transfer of beneficial interests in the company without a transfer of the corresponding shares of the bank, and, conversely, prohibits transfer of shares in the bank without a transfer of the corresponding beneficial interest in the company.

Article 6 provides for certain indorsements upon the certificate of bank shares and upon the certificates of beneficial interest in the company. These indorsements are in aid of the plan and purpose of the agreement.

Article 7 requires payment of company dividends to be made to shareholders of the bank whose certificates of bank shares are stamped or indorsed as provided in article 5. Payments of these dividends may be made by the trustees to the bank, and such payment will relieve the trustees from further liability on their account.

Article 10 provides for the amendment, modification, or termination of the agreement. Any of these can be accomplished only "with the written consent of the trustees and of two-thirds in interest of those for whom the capital stock of the investing company is then held by the trustees."

This, then, is the situation: The company was not independently organized, but was organized by the bank, its officers and shareholders, acting as such. Only shareholders of the bank were permitted an interest in the company and these only in the proportion of their holdings in the bank. This constitution of the interests of the company must continue to the end, for no one can ever come into the company without coming into the bank, and no one can ever go out of the company without going out of the bank. The bank, by declaration of a dividend, furnished the entire capital of the company. No person can be an officer or director of the company unless he is an officer or director of the bank.

This is not all. The company has no independence of action. It has no control or authority over its own affairs. It is to be remembered that all its stock is to be held by the trustees, and of course, is to be voted by them. Plenary power over the company is therefore held by these trustees. Now, these trustees were not elected by the incorporators of the company nor by its stockholders. They were nominated by the agreement between the bank, its officers and shareholders, made before the company was in existence. They can not be removed, nor can their successors be elected or determined by any power or interest of the company. The trustees, nominated by the agreement, perpetuate themselves. They appoint their own successors. The only power outside themselves which can make a change in their membership is the shareholding body of the bank. The shareholders by not continuing a trustee as an officer or director of the bank eliminate him as a trustee. The official organization of the company and the vesting of its powers are determined and can be determined only by the corporate action of the bank.

And the agreement which accomplishes all these things is beyond the scope of the legitimate action of the bank to change or terminate. Two-thirds of the shareholders of the bank and the trustees must agree before there can be a change in it or an end of it. In this matter, so material to the welfare of the bank, the shareholders and the directors have abdicated their powers and duties and abandoned them to a minority of their number and the three trustees.

To facilitate the conduct of the business of the company by the officers of the bank, article 10 of the certificate of incorporation of the company provides that no transaction entered into by the company shall be affected by the fact that its officers or directors are contracting for their own benefit, or for the benefit of any firm, association, or corporation in which they may be interested in any wise.

This arrangement between the bank and the company virtually consolidates them, unifies their every interest, and requires that all the powers and capacities of both shall always be exerted in unison—or it does not.

If we have two institutions, and not one, chartered as each one of them is by public authority, and by different sovereignties, then each has its own peculiar mission and its own distinctive rights and duties, powers, and obligations. The bank is not concerned with the company, except as it might be with any other possible borrower of its funds, and the company is not concerned with the bank, except as it might be with any other institution whose funds it might wish to borrow. The bank will not be influenced to lend money in aid of any enterprise in which the company may be engaged, because of that fact, and the company will not, because of its relations with the bank, look to it the more readily for financial support. The business of each will be conducted with regard to its own distinctive advantage.

If these institutions are twain in the substantial sense indicated, then the arrangement which places the control of the company so absolutely and irrevocably under trustees appointed by the bank, and subject to change only by the corporate action of the bank, offends the fundamental law that "no servant can serve two masters; for either he will hate the one and love the other, or else he will hold to the one and despise the other." This law is implied in every line of the charter of the bank, and the attempt to repeal it in the tenth article of incorporation of the company is vain and nugatory.

If, however, the mission of the bank and the mission of the company are alike and linked always in interest and welfare, if the rights and duties of the two are necessarily harmonious and reciprocal, if the bank at all times must cooperate with the company and the company with the bank, if the officers and directors of the bank who are also the officers and directors of the company can not come into the predicament of divided allegiance, and, indeed, are in the service of but one master, then the bank involved is engaged, participating in, and conducting the business of the company, business beyond its chartered powers, business that is not national banking.

Only the absolute unity and identity of interest between the two institutions would afford moral excuse for the fusion of their powers under one control, but that excuse can not justify transgression of the positive mandate of the national banking act, which, from considerations of public interest, has determined that national banking shall be a business apart to be conducted by institutions organized for that purpose and for no other.

I am constrained to conclude that as to the bank the agreement violates the law, in its details, because it impairs and limits the right of transfer of shares and because it assumes to bind the bank beyond the possibility of release by the majority action of its shareholders and directors, and its general plan and scope, because it embarks the bank in business and ventures beyond its corporate powers.

The operations under this agreement are proper to be considered, and what is said in this connection is based upon a letter of date July 26, 1911, from President ——— to United States Attorney ———.

At that date $9,679,000 of the capital stock of the company had been paid up, showing that more than 96 per cent of the shareholders of the bank had come into the arrangement.

The company had made investments in the shares of 16 different banks and trust companies, the aggregate number of shares being 29,178. The market value of these was not shown. In addition, approximately $3,200,000 had been invested in other companies of different character.

Of the banks, nine were national banks. The number of shares held by the company and the total number of shares of the capital stock of the banks is as follows:

Bank	Company's holdings	Total number of shares of capital stock of bank
Second National Bank of New York	10	10,000
Fletcher American National Bank of Indianapolis	167	20,000
American National Bank of Indianapolis [1]	250
Fourth Street National Bank of Philadelphia	500	30,000
National Shawmut Bank of Boston	1,000	35,000
Riggs National Bank of Washington	2,240	10,000
National Butchers and Drovers Bank of New York	3,000	3,000
Lincoln National Bank of New York	4,324	10,000
National Bank of Commerce of New York	9,800	250,000

[1] No such bank shown in the American Bank Reporter.

Thus the company holds the entire capital stock of the National Butchers and Drovers Bank, not even deducting the shares, 10 each, which its nine directors are by the law required to hold in their own right. This bank surely is not independent of the ——— ——— Bank, in view of the relations of each to the company.

The company wants but 677 shares to hold a majority of the capital stock of the ——— ———, and practically it may be said that when 4,324 out of 10,000 shares are held in one ownership, the control of the corporation has been secured.

If the ——— ——— Bank may extend its powers to the control of two other national banks, there is no limit to what it may do in that way. If the power exists, there is no restraint upon its exercise. By different methods and under other forms the ——— ——— Bank is doing, and in larger measure, what the Supreme Court in Concord First National Bank v. Hawkins, supra, declared to be in cantravention of the national banking act.

And the ——— ——— Co., considered by itself and apart from its relations to the ——— ——— Bank, is also in violation of law. Its charter from the State of New York expressly prohibits it from the business of banking. And that charter could not confer the power to engage in the business of national banking. Such power could be conferred only by the laws of the United States.

Section 5133, quoted above, confers the power to form a national banking association only upon "natural persons." Other sections of the law restrict the place of operations of the association to a single city, town, or village, and require that its directors shall be natural persons, all of whom have a substantial interest in the bank and three-fourths of whom must be citizens, and residents of the State in which the association operates. Then, too, as we have seen, the bank may not as an investment acquire the shares of another bank, or, indeed, of any other corporation. The purpose and the result are that each national bank must be a local, independent institution, managed by natural persons, and not linked by proprietary interest with any other business than that of national banking.

It is not necessary to consider whether the national banking act absolutely prohibits the holding of shares in a national bank by a State corporation to any extent or for any purpose, and it may be conceded that a State corporation may acquire such shares as an incident to securing payment of a debt and hold them to a convenient time for sale, or that an institution like a trust company may hold them in a fiduciary capacity, but certainly there can be no holding of such shares by any corporation when the result is to defeat the policy of the national banking act; that is, to destroy the local character of the bank, break down its independence, vest its control in another corporation, and link it in substantial proprietary interest with some other business than national banking.

The ——— ——— Company may embark in almost any business whatever, and in fact has made large investments in other enterprises than banking. It has acquired ownership of all the stock of the National Butchers and Drovers Bank, a virtually controlling interest in the Lincoln National Bank, and interests of magnitude in other national banks.

The ownership of property implies duties as well as rights. As the company owns all the shares of the Butchers and Drovers Bank it has a duty with respect to them. It must vote them at shareholders' meetings, it must elect the directors of the bank, and decide important questions of policy. If this is not conducting the business of a national bank, how shall it be characterized?

In Anglo-American Land Co. v. Lombard (122 Fed. Rep. 721, l. c. 736) the Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit, in an opinion by Van Devanter, J., now a Justice of the Supreme Court, held that the acquisition by a Missouri company of the stock, and control of a Kansas company was illegal. He said:

"* * * Where it is not otherwise provided, the implication in a grant of corporate power and life is that the corporation shall exercise its powers and carry on its business through its own officers and employees, and not indirectly, through another corporation operated under its control, and that it shall maintain an independent corporate existence, and not surrender the control of its affairs or the exercise of its powers to another corporation. Conceding that a corporation of a private character, not charged with any public duties, may, in pursuance of appropriate action on the part of its stockholders, sell all of its property, wind up its affairs, and permanently retire from business, still, in the absence of express authorization, neither the corporation nor its stockholders can, incidental to the sale of its property or otherwise, clothe another corporation with the right to maintain the corporate life or exercise the corporate powers. These views are sustained, and the reasons therefor are fully set forth in De La Vergne Co. v. German Savings Institution (175 U. S. 40, 54, 20 Sup. Ct. 20, 44 L. Ed. 66), Buckeye Marble & Freestone Co. v. Harvey (Tenn.), (20 S. W. 427; 18 L. R. A. 252; 36 Am. St. Rep. 71), Easum v. Buckeye Brewing Co. (C. C.), (51 Fed. 156), and in the cases there cited."

We are dealing with corporations of a public character, with national banks, which have public duties to perform, and of these it is a peculiar obligation "to maintain independent corporate existence and not surrender control of their affairs or the exercise of their powers to another corporation."

No authority is given by the Federal statutes to the National Banking Association for assigning their powers and delegating their duties to a corporation created by a State, and which, under its charter from the State, may engage in a business and exercise powers denied to the banking association by the law of its creation.

Here again it is to be observed that if the power in question exists, it exists without limit. The company may extend its power to the full control of all the banks into which it has made entrance. Nor need it stop with these. As it grows by what it feeds upon it may expand into a great central bank, with branches in every section of the country. It is in incipient stage, a holding company of banks, with added power to hold whatever else it may find to be to its advantage.

Where public law and public policy are involved, forms and fictions are disregarded and the facts are dealt with as facts. In the Northern Securities case (193 U. S. 197) the securities company had acquired the majority of the shares of two great competing railway companies, and this was dealt with in effect as a consolidation of the railway companies. Harlan, judge, affirming the decree of the circuit court, said (p. 326):

"The stockholders of these two competing companies disappeared, as such, for the moment, but immediately reappeared as stockholders for the holding company which was thereafter to guard the interests of both sets of stockholders as a unit, and to manage, or cause to be managed, both lines of railroad as if held in one ownership. Necessarily, by this combination or arrangement, the holding company in the fullest sense dominates the situation in the interest of those who were stockholders of the constituent companies; as much so, for every practical purpose, as if it had been itself a railroad corporation which had built, owned, and operated both lines for the exclusive benefit of its stockholders. Necessarily, also, the constituent companies ceased, under such a combination, to be in active competition for trade and commerce along their respective lines, and have become, practically, one powerful consolidated corporation, by the name of a holding corporation the principal, if not the sole, object for the formation of which was to carry out the purpose of the original combination under which competition between the constituent companies would cease."

So in the Standard Oil Case (221 U. S.) and in the Tobacco Case (221 U. S. 106) the holding of stocks by the principal companies in the various subsidiary companies was recognized and dealt with as engaging in, directing, and controlling the business of the subsidiary companies.

Here the ——— ——— Company is not simply to control banks, but it may engage in any business whatever, even that forbidden by its charter, if, despite its charter prohibition as to certain kinds of business, it may invest in the stocks of companies conducting such business. The other enterprises in which the company is engaged may stand in need of credit and of funds, and it is too much to expect that the company's banks will deal simply as banks, equitably and impartially as between its own subsidiaries and persons and corporations with whom it is not affiliated. The temptation to the speculative use of the funds of the banks at opportune times will prove to be irresistible. Examples are recent and significant of the peril to a bank incident to the dual and diverse interests of its officers and directors. If many enterprises and many banks are brought and bound together in the nexus of a great holding corporation, the failure of one may involve all in a common disaster. And if the plan should prosper it would mean a union of power in the same hands over industry, commerce, and finance, with a resulting power over public affairs, which was the gravamen of objection to the United States Bank.

I conclude the ——— ——— Company in its holdings of national-bank stocks is in usurpation of Federal authority and in violation of Federal law.

Respectfully submitted.

Sixty-four Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President, I propose to discuss quite briefly the sections of this bill that relate to affiliates—that is, subsidiary companies of banks organized for the purpose of purchasing and selling securities. In the pre-panic period from 1924 or 1925 to 1929 there was an extraordinarily rapid development in the security business. It reached such a volume, there were so many willing purchasers, so much credit for investment purposes was available that there resulted a complete change in our banking system in the respect that business enterprises all over the United States began to finance their requirements by the sale of their own securities rather than by borrowing at the commercial banks upon their commercial paper—that is, upon their notes. The buying public was so eager for these securities, which in the heyday of our earning power were showing increasingly good returns that there seemed to be no end to the movement. Consequently, by rapid stages the volume of corporate securities on which loans could be made by our banking system stepped up and up and up until brokers' loans reached the phenomenal figure of more than $8,000,000,000.

The commercial banking business in consequence of this extraordinary volume of security business declined. The banks had to change to a large extent their method of handling business. There was no longer the great demand for borrowing on commercial paper. The net result of it all was that we were in the flood tide of speculation. Encouraged by the banks, encouraged to a considerable extent by cheap money, easy credit, and by the very extensive loans of the Federal reserve system, a spirit of speculation took hold of almost everybody in the United States. From the cook to the captain everybody was watching the newspapers, everybody was looking for the record of the stock exchange ahead of all other news, international or domestic.

The net result was a gambling fever such as this country and no other country had ever before experienced. It reached its climax in October, 1929; and we are all very familiar with what has happened since. The tumble has been precipitous, and, of course, very disastrous, reaching into almost every home in the United States, with a net reduction in values, as represented by stock-exchange securities and bonds, of probably at least $60,000,000,000, which represents the decline and the rapid shrinkage of credit. We are getting down to a cash basis; relatively we are very near it.

How was all this expansion possible? The private banking houses obviously could not have handled all of it. It took money, currency; it took a very expansive credit, which, of course, brought in the banks. As far back as 1911 the banks were investing heavily in securities, buying and selling securities. Most of the banks had been engaged in underwriting, and still are. The security business became such an important part of the operations of some of the banks, particularly of two or three of our larger banks, that some fear was occasioned that they would get away from the strictly commercial business for which they were organized and put out securities of doubtful value. At any rate, there was a conflict of opinion; there was a conflict between the business of marketing securities and the business of protecting depositors' money. As the result of considerable controversy the national banks engaged in the security business were compelled to divorce their security business from their banking operations, and the term "affiliates" came into being as the result of that divorce. That, in its simplest term, is what we mean by "affiliate" in this bill.

There are two or three different kinds of affiliates, but I want to speak particularly of the affiliate which was formed out of the endeavor to get the banks away from the speculative business of dealing in securities for their customers and to require them to attend more strictly to commercial banking, for which they were originally organized, and particularly to the security of their depositors' funds. So, when we use the term "affiliate" in this sense and in connection with this bill, we mean that divorced subsidiary of a bank, whether State or National makes no difference, whose business it is to underwrite, purchase, and/or sell various securities as they come along in the market from day to day and week to week. The affiliates have reached enormous size; their growth has been phenomenal, coincident with the growth of the security business, which, as I have just described, is the outgrowth of the willingness of the public to buy readily and without very much inquiry all sorts of issues from the going businesses of the country.

We held very extensive hearings a year ago last January and February, and then finally having produced the draft of a bill, we again held very extensive hearings last winter on the question of affiliates. We found practically no argument in favor of leaving the affiliates as they are without any obligation to be examined, without any regulatory law governing their operation.

Many affiliates operate very much as a high-grade private banking house would do in the business of buying and selling securities. But abuses have crept in. A very notable case of such abuse of affiliates, which it will now do no harm to mention, is the Bank of the United States. There the practice had been so abused that nearly every time the officers of that bank bought a new parcel of real estate—and most of the parcels were in New York City—a so-called affiliate was organized to hold that particular parcel of real estate.

As the market for real estate advanced and new parcels were acquired other affiliates were organized to hold them, and so there were A, B, C, D, E, and F affiliates, some of them with holdings running into several million dollars. Eventually they were buying real estate at close to the top of the market. The whole thing was getting overloaded and top-heavy; they were pyramiding; they were financing by shoe-string operations; and of course it was inevitable that this great structure of innumerable affiliates should collapse. I have forgot the exact number of the affiliates of the organization referred to, but I think there were 50 or 55 in the city of New York alone, each controlling a large tract of land and some buildings; in nearly every case very expensive parcels of real estate. Long before the speculative boom had reached its climax this structure, built up with paper profits, collapsed, and great was the fall thereof. As I recall, it involved something like $495,000,000 of the money of innocent depositors, and that bank unfortunately belonged to the Federal reserve system. I cite that as a typical case of the excessive abuse of affiliates.

This could not have happened, in my opinion, if we had had examiners who were acting strictly under such provisions as are contained in the pending bill. This bill requires thorough and searching examinations of all affiliates, coincidental in every case with the examination of the parent bank itself under the direction of the Comptroller of the Currency. I make the distinction, and it is to be borne clearly in mind, which exists between the parent bank and the affiliate which operates under the parent bank.

The parent bank may own the stock of the affiliate, or its stock may be distributed to the stockholders of the parent bank, or a large portion of it may be owned outside; but that is irrelevant to the question I am discussing. The question is, Shall we control these affiliates or shall we end them? This bill proposes in various ways to examine them regularly, and coincidentally with the examination of the parent bank, and then requires them, at the end of three years, to separate from the parent company, with various provisions against interlocking officers and directors, and with other provisions for voting the shares of the parent company or bank, which up to now has been a kind of holding company.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PATTERSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. WALCOTT. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. I understand the Senator to say that under the terms of this bill, if it should be enacted into law, these affiliates will be ended.

Mr. WALCOTT. No; I did not mean to say that.

Mr. BORAH. Perhaps I misunderstood the Senator. The bill undertakes to control them?

Mr. WALCOTT. We undertake to control them by strict examination and regulation, but not to put an end to them. There is, perhaps, some question as to when we should separate them or divorce them from the parent company. This bill requires divorce at the end of three years; and a good many of the banks—some with affiliates, some without affiliates—think that that is hurrying the process too much. Some think that it would be better to extend the period to five years. Some banks feel that the affiliates should be allowed to exist indefinitely as to-day constituted, provided they exist under the strict regulations provided in this bill. That is a controversial point, but I do not know of any other controversial points in this portion of the bill relating to affiliates.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. WALCOTT. I do.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Will the Senator inform the Senate whether the bill provides a process of divorcement or separation?

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President, it is quite simple. I will read the brief passage which covers that matter, on page 8, line 11:

> After three years from the date of the enactment of the banking act of 1932, no certificate representing the stock of any State member bank shall represent the stock of any other corporation, except a member bank.

That is practically all there is to it.

> Nor shall the ownership, sale, or transfer of any certificate representing the stock of any such bank be conditioned in any manner whatsoever upon the ownership, sale, or transfer of a certificate representing the stock of any other corporation, except a member bank.

After three years, in a word, the affiliates must be divorced from the parent, which is called here "a member bank," because, which means a member of the Federal reserve system, a parent bank in the sense that it is the owner or controller through stock control of the affiliate or affiliates. Do I answer the Senator's question?

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. WALCOTT. I do.

Mr. FESS. Earlier in the Senator's presentation he mentioned the fact that whether it be a national bank or a State bank, the control of affiliates does not extend outside of the Federal reserve set-up; that is, an affiliate of a State bank that is not a member of the Federal reserve system is not covered, is it?

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President, there are State banks which exist now within the Federal reserve system, and they are member banks.

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. WALCOTT. There are national banks within the Federal reserve system. Most of the national banks are under the Federal reserve system; so that, whether State or whether national, provided the bank is a member of the Federal reserve system and has an affiliate, that affiliate must be divorced within three years.

Mr. FESS. The provision does not attempt to go beyond the Federal reserve system?

Mr. WALCOTT. It does not control State banking, and the reason for that is obvious: The Federal Government has no jurisdiction over State banks.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. WALCOTT. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. Referring to the divorce of which the Senator speaks, who is to initiate the proceedings? Does the bill depend upon the voluntary action of the banks to obey the law?

Mr. WALCOTT. There is a penalty clause here. The man who is to initiate the proceedings and enforce the provisions of this bill, as provided in the bill, is the Comptroller of the Currency in every case. He is also responsible for the examinations being held, just as he is now for the examination of a national bank.

I want to enlarge a moment upon bank loans and their uses, in order to clarify what seems to me a fundamental point in our whole banking system—a foundation stone upon which we have built up a financial structure.

It is evident from what has been said that the underlying factor in the whole prepanic situation was excessive use of bank credit. The question of excess is a question of judgment, and can only be determined by noting in specific terms the forms it has taken and the remedies to be applied to them.

The excessive use of bank credit in making loans for the purpose of stock speculation, or, more generally stated, for the excessive carrying of securities with borrowed money, was generally admitted before the panic of 1929, and almost universally since that time, to have been one of the sources of major difficulty, far exceeding in its scope any total that could be reasonably asked for as a basis for the financing of legitimate investment business. Under the same topic, too, must be mentioned the so-called "brokers' loans." These are merely a special form of securities loan in which a bank or commercial corporation or other enterprise advances funds through an intermediary—the broker—instead of lending direct. An excessive volume of brokers' loans must be considered in the light of the total volume of security loans outstanding. The category of brokers' loans obtained from "others" is a separate and especially difficult aspect of this problem. It was to these brokers' loans that I just alluded when I said they had reached the astounding total of more than $8,000,000,000 by September, 1929.

There seems to be no doubt anywhere that a large factor in the overdevelopment of security loans, and in the dangerous use of the resources of bank depositors for the purpose of making speculative profits and incurring the danger of hazardous losses, has been furnished by perversions of the national banking and States banking laws, and that, as a result, machinery has been created which tends toward danger in several directions.

I desire to enlarge upon that for just a moment, Mr. President. We have been drifting seriously because many of the States have passed laws that are so lax, and in my opinion so unsound, that they have created State banking situations surcharged with danger in troublous times, often not entirely sound even in good times, and as a result of this they furnish a kind of competition which in my opinion is thoroughly unwholesome. In my opinion, the competition of State banks operating under loose State laws has been so great that it has forced, willy-nilly, the more conservative national banks to take more or less unwarranted chances in running their business.

The net result of this competition between the State banking forces operating under loose laws and the national banking system operating under much more strict laws has been the disregard of a great many of the fundamentals of the banking business, taking chances with depositors' money, and the incorporation and rapid growth of the affiliate business, giving an outlet to that speculative type of business quite contrary to legitimate commercial banking. The net result is that to-day we have two billions and more of the money of innocent depositors locked up in closed banks. We have a complete collapse, in many cases, of these affiliate securities. We have banks that have closed their doors because they have overpurchased, as correspondent banks of some of the larger ones, the very securities that the larger banks have forced upon them.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for another question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut further yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. WALCOTT. I do.

Mr. FESS. My impression from an examination of that procedure was that many of these brokers' loans were made detached from any particular banking institution at all; that many of the agencies making brokers' loans were not banks; that they were organizations using their own funds, like some great corporation.

Mr. WALCOTT. That is quite true, Mr. President. I did not mean to imply that the Federal reserve system was responsible for all the brokers' loans. It was not; but it was responsible, probably, for a great deal by lending to member banks—mind you, I am not accusing the Federal reserve system of breaking the law; far from it—the member banks, in turn, loaned to various customers, many of whom were brokers.

In addition to that, however, demand money brought such a tremendous premium, as high as 18 per cent at one time, that the temptation was for corporations that had recently sold their securities and made themselves strong in cash to lend that cash and get an excessive rate of interest. Many corporations over a period of months averaged as high as 8 and 9 and 10 per cent on the money which they had available for lending; and they were lending it in many cases through banks that, in turn, would take a small commission for guaranteeing the safety of those loans. It was an extraordinary system that developed overnight.

Mr. FESS. That particular field is not open for us here to correct, is it?

Mr. WALCOTT. No.

Mr. FESS. But it does lie with the States.

Mr. WALCOTT. That was an incident of a rapid evolution; but, in my opinion, if the provisions of this bill governing affiliates are enacted, we shall not be embarrassed by a repetition of this debacle for some time—I hope never; but never is a long time.

Just one more point, Mr. President, and I am through. I have referred briefly to the penalty clause. It is severe, in that the Federal Reserve Board may revoke the permit of the affiliate company unless the affiliate company submits itself to these examinations; or, if the affiliate company in any way covers up its real position, its permit may not only be revoked but its portfolio, showing the list of all of its holdings, may at any time be made public if the affiliate is in any way getting out of hand or abusing its lawful rights.

I think that concludes the description of this section of the bill. It is perhaps the most vital section of the bill, one of the sections most needed at the present time. My reference to the competition which has grown up between State banks not under the Federal reserve system and the member banks of the Federal reserve system indicates, I think, very clearly that we should some day give very serious attention to a unified banking law in this country.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. WALCOTT. I yield.

Mr. DICKINSON. I was interested in what the Senator had to say with reference to the small banks which were interested in purchasing securities and bonds from the larger concerns. There was almost a propaganda put on for a while, and I remember out in our section of the country the officials more or less frowned upon the type of security which our banks had been using for 50 years and insisted that they get them out of the files and take what they called "quick assets." Then the "quick assets" began to shrink in value, and in a little while the banks had to close their doors and liquidate.

I am wondering why the committee left out the provision in section 5155 with reference to branches, "if such establishment and operation at the time permitted to State banks by the law of the State in question."

In other words, it looks as though the committee is trying to build this system up as an individual bank unit, while previously we always tried to maintain what was known as the State unit and give the State the authority to devise the types of banks they wanted, so far as branch banking was concerned. The committee has taken out of the law the sentence I have read.

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President, my answer to that is this: I have not intended to cover the law pertaining to branch banking. The Senator is quite correct in his statement, but that particular provision of the law does not concern the affiliates. I am leaving that subject to some one else to describe. I am particularly concerned with affiliates, which has been a very complex and a very controversial question in banking for the last 20 years.

Mr. DICKINSON. Do not the two phases of it go together?

Mr. WALCOTT. They interlock, as do many other questions in this financial system of ours. There will be found running through the whole course of banking in this country for the last 75 or 100 years this competition, continuing all the time, and getting now more and more acute, between the State banks, which are not members of the Federal reserve system, and the member banks of the Federal reserve system. It is a growing menace, in my opinion. It leads the conservative bank astray, or tends to, and apparently the national system has very little influence in correcting the abuses of the State system.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6477) to further extend naturalization privileges to alien veterans of the World War residing in the United States, requested a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. DICKSTEIN, Mr. MOORE of Kentucky, and Mr. JOHNSON of Washington were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

RELIEF OF AGRICULTURE

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, in the course of my remarks on agriculture last Thursday I discussed briefly the Goldsborough bill, recently passed by the House and now in the Committee on Banking and Currency of the Senate. I then asserted my belief—and submitted evidence in justification thereof—in the great possibilities of that measure, not only in revivifying agriculture but also every other industry.

I was pleased to learn this morning that the chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee, the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK], has already provided for a hearing on this bill, beginning next Thursday morning, and I wish to compliment him upon such [illegible]mptness in the premises.

Since 1922 the Federal reserve authorities have utilized open-market operations to the end of stabilizing credit and, incidentally, commodity prices. That is all that is proposed in the Goldsborough bill, except that it directs the Federal reserve authorities to utilize open-market transactions—that is, the buying and selling of Government bonds with Federal reserve notes, not merely to the end of incidentally stabilizing commodity prices but with such stabilization as the object of such transactions.

To those who may view such open-market transactions on an extensive scale with some apprehension, I would call their attention to the monthly report for May on economic conditions and governmental finance by the National City Bank of New York, and in this connection I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD that portion of the National City Bank's report on this subject.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The action of the Federal reserve authorities in determining to buy Government securities on a largely increased scale is a new and important development in the business situation. The reserve banks about the end of February began a program of purchases which averaged $25,000,000 weekly during the five weeks ended April 6. On April 13 Gov. George L. Harrison, of the New York bank, made a public statement that "the program has again been speeded up in rate and volume." The report of condition of the reserve banks on April 13, revealed an increase of holdings of Governments during the week of $100,000,000, and in the succeeding two weeks an increase of $206,000,000 occurred.

This action of the reserve authorities, taken for the purpose of creating easier money conditions, and thereby enabling the member banks first to free themselves of indebtedness to the reserve banks and then to offer funds more freely to the public or buy securities themselves, is probably the most important stroke of central bank policy ever made. Open market operations have never been undertaken before on the scale cited, but some way needs to be found to increase the amount of credit available, and evidently bolder and more powerful methods are called for than ever have been necessary in the past.

PRINCIPLES OF OPEN-MARKET OPERATIONS

Open-market operations for the purpose of influencing the money market are comparatively new in central bank practice. Central banking is an evolution in Europe from almost unregulated private banking, with numerous banks of issue, and the first step was by concentrating currency issues in each country in one central institution closely related to the Government. Its position as the source of currency issues naturally placed the central bank at the head of the country's banking system, other banks using it as a depository, looking to it for rediscounts as occasion might require and following its lead in financial policies of public importance. The central banks developed by experience the practice of using the discount rate to control the volume of credit and the movements of gold into and out of the country. Reserve bank credit is "money" in the market, and an advance of the discount rate tends to make "money" dearer throughout the country while a lowering of the rate has the opposite effect.

The influence of the discount rate has been supplemented to some extent in recent years by open-market operations, to wit, purchase or sale of securities by a central bank. A purchase by the bank giving a check on itself in payment puts credit into the money market and tends to make "money" easier, while, per contra, a sale of securities by the bank withdraws funds from the market and tends to make "money" dearer. Credit for discovery of the efficacy of open-market operations naturally belongs to the Bank of England, which long has had the problem of dealing with larger gold movements than any other institution and also has had resort to the most effectively organized money market in the world. It does not appear that other foreign central banks have used the practice to any great extent.

The Federal reserve authorities have resorted to open-market operations rather freely, buying and selling United States Government securities. The principle followed is that purchases are made when business is depressed, and sales when business is overexpanded, the aim being to promote stability in credit, prices, and trade. A statement by the New York Federal Reserve Bank to the Glass subcommittee of the Senate Banking and Currency Committee early last year gives the conditions under which the operations have been undertaken, as follows:

"Generally speaking, purchases of Government securities since 1922 have been made at times of business depression or recession in the United States accompanied by unemployment, declining foreign trade, weak commodity prices, and reduced speculative activity. Broadly speaking, also, sales of securities have taken place at times of large industrial activity, full employment, firm commodity prices, and tendencies toward excessive speculation. * * * Purchases and sales of Government securities since 1922 have been such as might reasonably be expected to exercise some influence toward business stability by aiding recovery at times of depression and retarding excesses at times of prosperity."

Following these principles, purchases in substantial volume were made in 1922, 1924, and 1927, periods of depression or threatened depression, and sales were made in intervening times to reduce the holdings and with a view to dampening speculative activity. At the end of 1929 and during 1930 the holdings were increased, and further purchases were made during 1931, though their effects were lost in the panic. When the Glass-Steagall bill became a law on February 27, 1932, the holdings amounted to $741,000,000. The banking situation having improved, but contraction of credit continuing, the time seemed appropriate for resumption of purchases; and the Glass-Steagall Act, by making such holdings available as the basis of currency issues, favored larger operations of this kind. For these reasons the purchases since made have aggregated $450,000,000.

RESERVE BANKS TAKE THE INITIATIVE

The special usefulness of open-market operations exists in the fact that the reserve banks take the initiative in making funds more plentiful. Ordinarily the initiative is with private borrowers, who apply to the banks where they do business. If these banks are without surplus reserves, it is their custom to borrow temporarily of the reserve banks to replenish them. This system works well enough in normal times and affords opportunity for the reserve authorities to use the discount rate to restrain excessive borrowing. It does not work so well when liquidation of bank credit is under way, with deposits and reserves falling by reason of the public determination to get out of debt, and by reason of the contraction caused by gold and currency withdrawals. Bank deposits for the most part are made by bank loans and investments, and decline as the volume of loans and investments is reduced. This credit can be called out again by a resumption of borrowing by the public, but with such extreme pessimism as has been manifested in the last year the public is disinclined to take the initiative and the banks are disinclined to borrow from the reserve banks to make loans, the more so as they have been compelled to borrow to meet cash withdrawals. Hence has resulted a shrinkage of about $500,000,000 in reserve deposits, at the low point of this year compared with one year ago, and of nearly four billions in loans and investments, of the reporting member banks only, in the same period.

This is credit lost to the current supply and the loss is an obstacle to business recovery. Since the public does not take the initiative to correct the situation, it is necessary for the credit-making authority to do so and by its own action increase the amount of credit available in the market. This can be done by the purchase of Government bonds, issuing new credit for the purpose. The checks given for the bonds will be deposited in banks and thence pass back to the reserve banks, either in payment for past rediscounts or for credit in the reserve accounts of the member banks, where the credit will serve as the reserve base for a possible expansion of member-bank loans or investments in at least ten times the volume.

EFFECTS OF REDUCING REDISCOUNTS

The indebtedness of the member banks to the reserve banks at present is an abnormal one, an effect of credit strain caused by the demands for currency and gold beginning last September which forced rediscounting in the largest amount since the fall of 1929. Of course, this borrowing did not add to the supply of credit, being more than offset by the currency and gold withdrawals. Since the beginning of this year, with currency returning to the banks, rediscounts have been declining. The new credit will further assist the member banks in paying off their debt, first in the larger centers and thence working outward, and as the volume of rediscounts is reduced the number of banks wholly out of debt to the reserve banks will increase and the strain on others will be lessened. As this is accomplished, the accumulation of reserve funds will naturally result in a more liberal attitude toward loan applications by the banks or possibly in bond investments for themselves, either of which will put the credit or "money" into circulation.

A manifestation of strength in the bond market will be helpful not only to Government but corporate financing, thus providing the means for expenditures which will increase employment. In short, by placing funds in the money market, where business goes to finance its needs, it supplies funds in the manner most helpful to sound business revival, supplies it by an orderly process, assuring wide distribution, and avoids the dangers that attach to large issues of paper money. It is a careful and calculated method, under experienced control, of overcoming the excessive deflation of credit and of encouraging business confidence and enterprise. Of course, an increased volume of currency will naturally result as needed by increased activity in business.

A further word may be said upon the attitude of the member banks, since it is the subject of very free comment. There are inquiries as to whether, or to what extent, the banks will put the new reserve credit to use, and some of the comment implies that there is no alternative between a policy of allowing the credit to stand idle as excess reserve, which would nullify the reserve banks' efforts, and one of making loans and investments at excessive risk, which would be unsound banking.

However, there is no such sharp line. Between the alternatives of excessive risk and excess reserves there is a border area of indeterminate width in which the policy of credit expansion may be expected to take effect. As stated, the market for Government and other very high-grade securities of unquestioned safety provides one channel for release of the credit. Moreover, the policy is calculated to revive enterprise and stimulate a demand for credit by good borrowers. Relief of the situation in communities whose credit facilities have been impaired by bank failures or by the effects of fear provides another channel. The effect of the operations of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is to restore the liquidity of banks which have been compelled to deny credits, and which indeed have become collectors instead of lenders. The effect of the reserve policy is to put new funds into the market which will become available to these banks, the two policies working together.

WORLD COOPERATION DESIRABLE

Undoubtedly this policy would have been inaugurated earlier but for manifestations of European misunderstanding of the measures being adopted in this country for relieving the credit situation, and the gold withdrawals from this country in consequence. Europe on account of past experiences is very sensitive to rumors about inflation or possible departure from the gold standard; and while this country has gold enough to meet any probable demand, it is desirable that misunderstanding should not be promoted. Financial circles in Europe now generally approve of the measures that at first were questioned, and of this Federal reserve policy, holding them soundly conceived and helpful to the world situation.

The inauguration of this policy on the scale now contemplated may result in the development of world cooperation by central banks for the more effective control of credit and prices. Obviously the banking system of a single country can not exercise the control over world prices that might be exercised by the banking systems of all countries or even the banking systems of a group including the more important countries, acting together. The prices in different markets of commodities entering into international trade are interlocked, and while they react upon each other, they must move promptly together, or the lagging ones will be a drag upon the others. Moreover, there is danger that a country leading an advance may lose trade by it. But all countries have a common interest in the stability both of credit and prices.

Able economists have maintained for years that the central banks of the world possessed the requisite organization and power, acting in cooperation, to stabilize the state of credit and the general price level to such an extent as to prevent the wide fluctuations which result in panic and disorder. Practical bankers have admitted the theoretical soundness of the principles involved, but feared popular opposition to anything that looked like international control of money and credit. Such cooperation, of course, would not attempt to control particular prices, and probably would not attempt to do more with general price movements than prevent the wide swings that result from excessive inflation and deflation of credit.

It is possible that the action now being attempted may enlist similar action in other countries and demonstrates the value of such continuous cooperation. The markets of the United States, by reason of this country's position as a source of supply of many commodities, exercise an important influence upon all world markets, but the effort to revive business and raise the price level should have support everywhere. The reserve system is giving the lead.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, as advantageous as would be such a measure as the Goldsborough bill, not only for agriculture, but also for all the other industries in this country, yet it is not all that is necessary to rehabilitate agriculture. We must have something of a constructive nature which will assure, notwithstanding surpluses, United States prices for farm products, inasmuch as the farmer must pay United States prices for the things he buys. This measure will not accomplish that purpose. We must enact an additional measure. We must enact a constructive measure which will make effective the tariffs we have afforded agriculture. There is nothing of that character pending before the Senate, there is nothing of that character pending in the House. But little more than 30 days of this session remain. What are we to do about it, I ask again? Something must be done for agriculture to rescue it from its present deplorable condition.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States submitting several nominations were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

INCREASE OF BANKING FACILITIES

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 4412) to provide for the safer and more effective use of the assets of Federal reserve banks and of national banking associations to regulate interbank control, to prevent the undue diversion of funds into speculative operations, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be received, printed, and lie upon the table.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I send to the desk a proposed amendment to the pending bill and ask that it be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be received, printed, and lie upon the table.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, the bill now before the Senate represents earnest efforts, extending over more than a year's time, on the part of the so-called Glass subcommittee to discover the causes that led up to the remarkable financial crash and depression, and to recommend to the Senate such measure as might tend to avoid a repetition of such causes. While it is a technical measure in some respects and may not be thoroughly understood by the whole country, yet in my humble opinion it is second to no measure in the effect which it ought to have in the restoration of public confidence at this time.

It has been a great pleasure to work with the subcommittee, because in the consideration of the measure no trace of partisanship has made its appearance. Such differences of opinion as have developed have been honest differences of personal opinion, and have been so far resolved that we are able to present to the Senate a measure in which the subcommittee is unanimous as to almost every feature.

The distinguished chairman of the committee has asked me to speak particularly upon one subject matter covered by the bill, and that is a subject matter concerning which we may have certain telegrams and protests from some of the bankers. I refer to the subject of security affiliates and the related subject of investment banking.

The bill, in section 16, at page 37, provides for separating security affiliates from national banks after a period of three years and makes the same provision in section 5, at page 8, for State banks which are members of the Federal reserve system. These provisions are reinforced by section 18, which appears at page 43, and which provides that no national bank and no State member bank may hereafter be affiliated with any organization engaged in the investment security business. The provision of section 14, at page 34, requires national banks to get out of the business of underwriting and dealing in investment securities, and again, in section 5, at page 8, there is the same provision with respect to State member banks.

Securities affiliates of banks are corporations operating in the long-term capital market in competition with the investment houses, typically unincorporated, that have traditionally done most of the business in that market.

Securities affiliates are controlled usually by having their stock placed in the hands of trustees, who hold it for the pro rata beneficial interest of the bank concerned, each certificate of stock in the bank evidencing by indorsement the ownership also of the same number of shares of stock in the affiliate. All such affiliates are, of course, State-chartered corporations. The majority of them, or about two-thirds, belong to national banks, and about one-third to State banks, the reason for this difference being apparently that State charters are often more liberal than national charters, and grant powers which make an affiliate superfluous. It is also possible for State banks to own their affiliates outright in many States, and this makes resort to the device of trusteed stock less common with them than with national banks. Many of the important securities affiliates, especially those controlled through trusteed stock, were provided with their original capital by declaration of a stock dividend.

In the United States the mechanism for the supply of long-term funds to industry and to Government borrowers was originally in the hands of private bankers almost exclusively. Two causes appear to have brought this about. The first was that capital in any amount had to be imported from Europe, and the intermediaries were usually private individuals; frequently they were the agents of foreign bankers. The second is that nearly all the more important American banks after the Civil War were incorporated under national charter as banks of issue, with limited powers, and were typically of small size. The aggressive lead in supplying long-term needs was therefore taken by private houses and held by them with little competition until very recent years.

The first bank apparently to concern itself quite definitely with securities transactions was the First National Bank of New York, which seems to have engaged in syndicate operations as early as 1911. It organized its affiliate, the First Security Co., in 1908, by declaration of a stock dividend, but the bank itself has always appeared more active in securities business than the affiliate, chiefly as an underwriter. It is understood that this affiliate is used largely to hold long-term securities of a kind which the bank itself has no legal authority to hold or for other reasons desires to segregate from its banking assets. This affiliate is controlled through trustees, who hold its stock for the pro rata beneficial interest of the bank's stockholders.

In 1911 the National City Co. was organized, its capital being supplied by a stock dividend, and its stock was trusteed. A question of the company's legality was raised by the Government, Attorney General Wickersham disapproving it and Secretary of the Treasury MacVeagh approving it. It seems to have been designed originally, like the First Security Co., to hold stocks rather than to deal in them, but by 1916 it was known as an "investment distributing" organization, and subsequently it became one of the largest agencies in the securities business, integrating to a greater extent than any other company, incorporated or unincorporated, all the steps of origination, underwriting, wholesaling, and retailing.

The establishment of these two pioneer companies was followed by the establishment of many others, the great majority of them small and engaged mostly in wholesaling and retailing. Many of these affiliates act as holding companies or do miscellaneous things that the banks controlling them can not do or can not do so effectively. Organization of them was induced by the general desire to increase profits, and in the case of the larger ones which undertook origination, by the particular advantage the banks had in knowing the concerns which might want or might be induced to obtain new capital. Moreover these banks were already being called on by originators, syndicates, and distributors to finance flotations, and for that reason also they were in a strategic position to enter the field of competition. Although the competitive importance of these large securities affiliates activity engaged in origination is very great, the number of them is small.

Banks may at present be engaged in the securities business either in their own name or through the medium of an affiliate. In either event, it will only be the larger ones that are active in origination and underwriting. The smaller ones will be active only in retailing. In general the degree of activity, whether in origination, underwriting, or distribution, will determine whether or not the bank has a securities affiliate; but this is not always true. Some banks of comparatively large size, such as the Union Trust Co. of Pittsburgh, which has no securities affiliate, or the First National Bank of New York, which has one, will do considerable in their own name.

That the larger banks only should be engaged in origination and underwriting is due to the fact that securities issues will ordinarily be in the hundreds of thousands or millions of dollars. Even a small issue can probably be handled by a large bank as well as by a small one or possibly better; the question is one of facilities. Moreover a bank which has opportunities for origination may prefer to turn them over to another bank to be worked up, and secure for itself a larger commission on the underwriting and distribution. Banks which have gone into origination do so on a more comprehensive and omnivorous scale than the older unincorporated houses of issue. The latter specialized more selectively not only as to the kind of business but as to the particular corporations and the size of transactions they undertook to finance. Thus a given house would specialize not only in railways but in certain railways. The banks that recently entered the field seem not to have been observant of such limitations, however; they have sought business aggressively wherever they could get it. Of the total of about 300 securities affiliates of banks the ones that in the last five years have been conspicuous in origination are the following:

National City Co., New York.

Chase Harris Forbes Corporation, New York. (Successor as to securities business of the Chase Securities Corporation, of which it is a subsidiary.)

First National Old Colony Corporation, Boston.

Continental Illinois Co., Chicago.

Bancamerica-Blair Corporation, New York. (Subsidiary of Transamerica and affiliate of Transamerica banks. Not included in National City-Bank of America consolidation.)

Bancamerica Co., San Francisco. (Subsidiary of Transamerica and affiliate of Transamerica banks.)

First Detroit Co., Detroit. (Subsidiary of Detroit Bankers Co. and affiliate of First Wayne National Bank and other subsidiary banks.)

The foregoing list is not exhaustive. Other affiliates have engaged in origination, but the list is probably inclusive of those that have been most active and prominent. It does not include, however, important bank affiliates that, although large enough to have gone aggressively into origination, seem to have chosen to confine themselves principally to underwriting and distribution.

These would include the following and some others:

Guaranty Co., New York.

Security First National Co., Los Angeles.

First Chicago Corporation, Chicago.

Among the things that led American banks into the securities business one of the most important appears to have been the correspondent relationship. This is not to say that without the correspondent relationship the business would not have developed, but rather that the relationship furnished a peculiarly inviting system of distribution. The country banks were becoming increasingly aware of the desirability of diversifying their own portfolios with marketable securities, and also aware of opportunities to retail securities to their customers. At the same time they were dependent either on their city correspondents or on private distributing houses for advice in the selection of investments. The metropolitan banks, therefore, found themselves between their country correspondents who wanted securities and their customer corporations who wanted long-term financing. The one afforded distribution and the other supply. So long as they themselves stayed out of the field the business went to private houses who had not the contact either for origination or for distribution that the banks themselves had, for the latter's relations both with their corporation customers and with their country bank correspondents was constant and intimate. The private houses of issue might be extremely close to a few clients, but they could not have the wide and general access that the large banks had. It is natural that the city banks should have realized their advantage and made the most of it.

In the beginning the tendency probably was for them simply to take larger and larger shares in underwritings and in distribution; but as they did so they were able to exact more and more commission, and eventually if they chose, they were able to invade the field of origination themselves and integrate all the securities functions.

Once committed to the activity on a large scale, they would probably be led to cultivate more intensively the opportunities which the correspondent relationship had opened up to them. This would make securities business more important throughout the American banking structure and impel inland and country banks to set up securities affiliates in order to share more actively in the retail of issues.

As the possibilities in the correspondent relationship became developed, the private distributing houses were keenly aware of the disadvantage they were put under by having no such extensive and dependent a system of outlets as the city banks had. A number, both large and small, sold out to banks and became their securities affiliates, such as Blair & Co. to the Bank of America, New York; W. R. Compton & Co. to the Chatham Phenix National Bank & Trust Co., New York, and so forth.

This advantage in distribution went hand in hand with an increase in the number and amount of issues brought out by banks in 1928 and 1929—an increase that was partly due to business won from private houses, but even more in all likelihood to entirely new capital business that the spirit of the time and the energy of the originators combined to generate. It would be wrong to assume, however, that bank affiliates alone were aggressive, for some of the private houses, such as Dillon, Read & Co. were also intensely active.

All together there appear to be about 300 securities affiliates in the country. This does not mean that the same number of banks have securities affiliates, for in bank groups one securities affiliate may do the securities business for all the banks in the group. Of these 300, about 200 belong to national banks, about 70 to State bank members of the Federal reserve system, and about 30 to nonmember banks. The 270 belonging to member banks, even allowing for those that are in groups and therefore representing numerous banks, is a small number in comparison with the number of member banks in the Federal reserve system, which is approximately 7,000. The banks associated with the 270 or so securities affiliates are, of course, in the main of the largest size and even though they are few in number they represent probably more than half of all the banking business in the country.

Since 1929 there has naturally been a marked diminution in the activity of securities affiliates. Further than this they have absorbed very large losses in their portfolios, and reduced their capital in consequence. Some have dissolved entirely. According to published announcements, the National City Co. reduced its capital in 1931 from $55,000,000 to $11,000,000. The Chase Securities Corporation in 1931 reduced its capital, surplus, and undivided profits from $110,000,000 to $58,000,000. (The Chase Securities is not the operating securities affiliate of the bank, but indirectly owns it. The figures for the operating affiliate, Chase Harris Forbes Corporation, are not available.) The capital of the Guaranty Co. was reduced in the same year from $20,000,000 to $10,000,000. Figures for other important securities affiliates appear not to have been published. The following were discontinued entirely: The Bankers Co., capital $2,500,000, was absorbed in 1931 by the Bankers Trust Co.; the International Manhattan Co., subsidiary of the Manhattan Co., and affiliate of Bank of Manhattan Trust Co., was liquidated in 1931. The Chatham Phenix Corporation was sold to the Atlas Utilities Corporation in 1931 by the Chatham Phenix National Bank & Trust Co. before it consolidated itself with the Manufacturers' Trust Co. The Chemical Securities Corporation was absorbed by the Chemical Bank & Trust Co. in 1932.

These reductions of capital and dissolutions of corporate entity all appear to be retrenchments consequent upon losses; they do not appear to be due to voluntary change of policy. In the case of reductions in capital, the continued existence of the securities affiliate would indicate an expectation of continuing the securities function. In the case of the dissolutions, what has actually happened is that the function itself, much diminished as the result of securities-market recessions, has been taken over by the bank, and the separate corporation hitherto conducting it has been discontinued. There is probably little warrant for a conclusion that because the banks have pared down or dissolved their securities affiliates, they have abjured venturing henceforth into the long-term capital market.

The question we have had to meet in the preparation of this bill is, as has been stated by the able Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT], whether the securities affiliate relationship is to be permitted to continue under strict regulation or is to be required to be terminated. The banks generally have not indicated any intention of going out of the investment-security business.

The important and underlying question is whether banking institutions receiving commercial and savings deposits ought to be permitted at all to engage in the investment-security business. The existence of security affiliates is a mere incident to this question. An investment affiliate might be desired by a bank which under its charter is not permitted to go into the investment business, as is the case with national banks, or it might be considered advisable to set up an affiliate for the purpose of segregating the capital employed in the investment-security business so that the risks involved would not be carried directly by the institution responsible for money received on deposit.

The general principle involved is one that admits of argument, since there is foreign experience and tradition both ways. The English banks of deposit have kept themselves strictly clear of the investment-security business, while the big German banks, on the other hand, have not hesitated to make substantial investments of their own funds in promotions and refinancings with a view to public distribution at such time as might be convenient. In banking literature there are arguments both ways. It seems, however, that the English banking situation has been maintained in a more satisfactory and creditable manner than the German, and that whatever we may learn from comparison of English and German banking should lead us to prefer the English practice, under which commercial banking is strictly segregated from the origination and underwriting of capital issues.

It should not be assumed that any definite, final conclusion can be drawn from foreign experience, and what I shall have to say in support of the segregation of commercial and savings banking from the dealing in investment securities is based entirely upon American conditions and American experience.

It is clear that the national bank act was intended to set up a system of commercial banks, and did not extend to national banks the right to go into the investment-security business in any way. That view has been reinforced by the able opinion of Solicitor General Lehmann brought here by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] yesterday, and which the Senate authorized to be printed as a Senate document.

It is clear, also, that until comparatively recent years this segregation of two different lines of banking was generally observed by institutions existing under State laws. And up to 20 years ago practically all the investment banking in this country was done by institutions specializing in that service.

Early in this century certain State banking institutions began setting up bond departments and began to engage in the origination, underwriting, and distribution of investment securities and also began to trade in them. There is still a considerable volume of such transactions carried on directly by banks of deposit, but a recognition of the risks involved has impelled many banks to set up subsidiary or so-called affiliate institutions in order that the capital stock and the stockholders' liability of the parent bank might be held inviolate for the protection of regular banking operations and for the benefit of depositors. Such affiliate corporations, whether of National or State banks, might be owned outright by the parent banks or by trustees for the benefit of the bank or of the bank's stockholders or perhaps by the same stockholders as the bank, with the restriction that stock of the affiliate might be transferred concurrently with stock of the parent bank and not otherwise.

This activity of State banking institutions spreading out into the investment-security field has been matched by many national banks, the pioneers in this respect being the First National and National City Banks of New York. It seems perfectly clear that in the organization of these affiliates under State laws, usually with broad charter powers not only to engage generally in the investment security business but to hold, control, and operate enterprises involving various kinds of business, sometimes including the ownership and control of banks, the national banks which thus set up affiliates presumed to exercise charter rights not contemplated by the national bank act, and indeed directly in conflict with the purpose and intent of their national charters which authorized them only to engage in the business of commercial banking.

Such a departure on the part of national banks was clearly never authorized by law, and it is difficult to understand why it should have been permitted to grow and develop as it has. In any event it has within the past 20 years, but particularly within the past 6 or 7 years, developed on so great a scale that the contention is made that it is now too late to argue that it should be stopped on account of its contravention of the purpose and intent of the law. If it is to be stopped now, it will be stopped not for any technical or legal reason but only after a reconsideration and revaluation of the questions of banking policy involved.

In such a reconsideration of policy it is obvious that there is no valid distinction between national banks and State banks which are members of the Federal reserve system. It is only fair to make a single rule for all banking institutions which receive commercial and savings deposits, regardless of whether their charters are derived from State or National authority; and the real question is not whether such banks shall be permitted to have investment-security affiliates but rather whether they should be permitted to engage in the investment-security business in any manner at all, through affiliates or otherwise.

When the national banks, through their affiliates, followed into the investment-banking business after the State banks had established their bond departments and subsequently their own affiliates, the idea of increased profits more and more obsessed our bankers. Perhaps there was an element of greed in this obsession, and perhaps it was largely a question of professional pride in keeping profits and dividends of one important banking institution up to the level of those of its rivals or a little ahead. Did not professional pride become diverted from the pride of safe and honest banking service to that of profits, greed, expansion, power, and domination? In order to be efficient a securities department had to be developed; it had to have salesmen; and it had to have correspondent connections with smaller banks throughout the territory tributary to the great bank. Organizations were developed with enthusiasm and with efficiency. The distribution of the great security issues needed for the development of the country was facilitated, and the country developed. But the sales departments were subject to fixed expenses which could not be reduced without the danger of so disrupting the organization as to put the institution at a disadvantage in competition with rival institutions. These expenses would turn the operation very quickly from a profit to a loss if there were not sufficient originations and underwritings to keep the sales departments busy.

It was necessary in some cases to seek for customers to become makers of issues of securities when the needs of those customers for long-term money were not very pressing. Can any banker, imbued with the consciousness that his bond-sales department is, because of lack of securities for sale, losing money and at the same time losing its morale, be a fair and impartial judge as to the necessity and soundness for a new security issue which he knows he can readily distribute through channels which have been expensive to develop but which presently stand ready to absorb the proposed security issue and yield a handsome profit on the transaction?

It is easy to see why the security business was overdeveloped and why the bankers' clients and country bank correspondents were overloaded with a mass of investments many of which have proved most unfortunate.

While the banks competed with each other in the business of finding and distributing issues of investment securities, yet they had at all times one great common interest—none of these profits could be made unless the condition of the securities market was such as to assure the absorption of securities. Most of the banks, certainly all the great ones, were interested, therefore, in a good market for capital securities. Can there be any doubt that under such pressure of competition there was an overproduction of capital securities? Can there be any doubt that in order to maintain the market conditions which would absorb the great production of capital securities and produce the big profits for the affiliates and bond departments commercial banks went astray by encouraging an overdevelopment of collateral-security loans? Is it not fair to attribute the vast development of loans on collateral security at least in part to the necessity for keeping up a market condition capable of absorbing capital issues? It does not matter whether this motive was deliberate or subconscious; the fact remains that the banks generally were involved in it, and that if they are permitted to continue in the investment-security business the same motive will be provided for a repetition of the same performance. If, on the other hand, the business of originating and underwriting investment securities is confined to houses not engaged in deposit banking, then the extent and the desirability of new issues will be subjected to an independent and impartial check. This should tend to restore public confidence.

There is another phase of the situation which can not but have some effect upon the people's confidence in banks. The investment-security business is attended with certain risks. Market conditions may change after the making of a commitment in such a way as to cause considerable loss to an underwriter. A certain issue was underwritten in 1929 at $139,000,000, and the market price of the entire amount of that issue is to-day approximately $18,000,000. That is, of course, an extreme instance but not an unparalleled one. It is no doubt true that only a part of this loss fell upon the underwriter, in that particular case a banking affiliate. But with that much basis of truth, it would not be surprising if rumors went around that a large proportion of such a loss had to be taken by the affiliate in question. And although such a loss would possibly not result in any substantial impairment of the resources of the banking institution owning that affiliate, still it might be suspected that large amounts might have been loaned to the affiliate; and whether that were true or not, there can be no doubt that the whole transaction tends to discredit the bank and impair the confidence of its depositors.

It seems now that the principal responsibility for failure to detect the scandalous frauds connected with the issuance of Kreuger securities can be laid to a firm of private bankers. Yet there were commercial banks and affiliates of commercial banks who participated in the underwriting; and it is clear that public confidence in banks is impaired by events of this character.

It is alleged that the affiliate of a great bank some three years ago accepted a commission for underwriting a new issue of stock to be offered to the stockholders of a great corporation. Shortly before the expiration of the stockholders' rights to subscribe to the issue the great bank in question participated in a stock-market pool to hold the price of the corporation stock somewhat above the price at which it had been offered to the stockholders.

The success of the pool operation resulted in a complete subscription by the stockholders, and the great bank had earned its underwriting commission without being obliged to take up any part of its stock commitment. There is, however, a legal opinion to the effect that the participation by this bank in the stock-market pool amounted to a fraud upon the stockholders of the corporation, in that it deliberately deceived them as to the value of their subscription rights; and it is at least conceivable that legal action might be brought against that particular great bank. The effect of such a suit upon the confidence of depositors in that particular bank would necessarily be bad, and, unfortunately, such a development would have the tendency to undermine confidence in banks generally so long as banks of deposit are permitted to engage directly or indirectly in the underwriting business.

Let us now consider what effect this question has on the relation of a commercial and savings bank to its depositors. The banker ought to be regarded as the financial confidant and mentor of his depositors. This underlying relationship is a natural and desirable one with respect to all depositors, although the aspects of it and the kind of advice called for will necessarily vary a great deal from the poor widow whose life savings are evidenced by a savings passbook to the great corporation requiring financial aid in the development of intricate business problems.

Obviously, the banker who has nothing to sell to his depositors is much better qualified to advise disinterestedly and to regard diligently the safety of depositors than the banker who uses the list of depositors in his savings department to distribute circulars concerning the advantages of this, that, or the other investment on which the bank is to receive an originating profit or an underwriting profit or a distribution profit or a trading profit or any combination of such profits.

It is a long-established rule of English and American law that a trustee may not profit by dealing with his trust estate. It makes no difference that in an individual case a trustee might buy from his trust or sell to his trust to the real advantage of the trust estate. He is not permitted to trade with the estate at all. This is no reflection upon the honor or probity of trustees as a class; it is a recognition of a certain frailty of human nature that makes it dangerous for any man to represent the buyer when he is himself the seller.

The rule is well stated by Justice Day in Magruder v. Drury (235 U. S. 119) as follows:

> It is a well-settled rule that a trustee can make no profit out of his trust. The rule in such cases springs from his duty to protect the interests of the estate and not to permit his personal interest to in any wise conflict with his duty in that respect. The intention is to provide against any possible selfish interest exercising an influence which can interfere with the faithful discharge of the duty which is owing in a fiduciary capacity. * * * In effect, he is not allowed to unite the two opposite characters of buyer and seller, because his interests, when he is the seller or buyer on his own account, are directly conflicting with those of the person on whose account he buys or sells.

Let us consider, then, whether this is not also a good rule with respect to bankers. If we want banking service to be strictly banking service, without the expectation of additional profits in selling something to customers, we must keep the banks out of the investment security business.

Take the other side of the picture: A corporation, having carried its account with a bank, having borrowed from that bank for its ordinary commercial requirements, is confronted with the question of raising long-time funds by the issuance of securities. If it is to have the advice of its banker untainted by the prospect of obtaining an originating or underwriting profit we must keep the banks out of the investment security business. If we are to relieve the banker of the temptation to put pressure upon his commercial borrower to put out a security issue on which the banker will make either an originating or an underwriting profit we must keep the banks out of the security business. If the public is to be protected against the possibility of bad bank loans being set up into bond issues to be sold to savings depositors of the same banks without the exacting scrutiny of an independent underwriter interested primarily in the soundness of the securities he is about to sell we must prohibit the banks from engaging in the security business. If we are to keep banks from being tempted to make security loans in order to help make a market or to finance the purchase of securities on which the lending bank is making an originating or underwriting commission we must keep banks out of the investment security business. And if we are to save banks from the embarrassment of having to appraise, as collateral security offered by prospective borrowers, the very securities which their own affiliates have sold to those customers we must keep the banks out of the investment-security business.

It is not, of course, contended that the abuses here intimated are never avoided by the good conscience of the bankers. On the contrary, I believe they are avoided generally by good bankers. Certainly they are avoided much more often than they occur. Yet the danger is always there, and must be there as long as human nature remains human nature. And just as we believe in the strictest rules for the conduct of trusts, just as we believe in examination and audits of institutions whose officers are worthy of the highest confidence as to honor and ability, we must surround the banking business with sound rules which recognize the imperfection of human nature that our bankers may not be led into temptation, the evil effect of which is sometimes so subtle as not to be easily recognized by the most honorable man.

Throughout the development of investment securities affiliates and the development of the investment security business directly through the bond departments of banks, there have been banks which have remained free from this operation. A notable case is that of the Central Hanover Trust Co., of New York, which for years has publicly stressed the fact that it had no securities company, and, consequently, "nothing to sell." Even during the boom period, when the majority of its competitors were in the thick of securities distribution, the Central Hanover affirmed its policy and solicited business on the strength of it. It is to be noted that the Central Hanover, preeminently among American banks, is a trust company not merely in name but in fact, for trust business bulks unusually large in its activities beside commercial banking; and that it emphasized its abstention from securities business, not only in advertising the soundness of its commercial banking department, more particularly in advertising the disinterestedness of its trust service, the assurance being that it could not invest any funds of which it was trustee in any securities issues sponsored by itself. The same argument was also good in urging its ability to advise country correspondents upon the purchase of securities for their portfolios.

While it is true that the Central Hanover advertising has been largely directed to its investment securities department, still, as I demonstrated a few moments ago, it is true that the acceptance of deposits from the public is in itself a public trust which ought to be kept free of the investment-security business.

In line with that thought, and to bring out clearly the tendency of institutions now to see the error of the ways of those who have gone too far in the investment security business, I want to read an announcement recently made by a great New York institution. This institution is also a trust company, but please note that the consideration which impelled it to go out of the investment security business relates also to the acceptance by it of deposits. I read from the Commercial and Financial Chronicle of December 12, 1931, the announcement of the Bank of Manhattan Trust Co. as to the discontinuance of its affiliate.

In indicating the discontinuance of the securities affiliate—International Manhattan Co. (Inc.)—and the carrying on of its activities by the Bank of Manhattan Trust Co., a statement issued on December 10, after meetings of the boards of directors, said:

> After mature deliberation the conclusion has been reached that it is to the best interests of the group to follow the trend of opinion strongly expressed in some quarters to the effect that deposit banks should not have affiliated securities companies. The International Manhattan Co. (Inc.) has operated successfully and in every sense satisfactorily during most difficult times. After writing all securities down to market, its capital and surplus of $2,200,000 are unimpaired, but it is felt that the mere existence of a securities affiliate, no matter how carefully and conservatively run, is inconsistent with the best interests of the trust company and, therefore, of the group as a whole. Accordingly, the Bank of Manhattan Trust Co. will carry on such of the activities of the International Manhattan Co. (Inc.) as are consistent with the most conservative trust-company practice.

Mr. President, I hope that the sections of this bill to which I have alluded, prohibiting the carrying on of the investment security business by national and State member banks, whether through the medium of affiliates or otherwise, will be adopted.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. BULKLEY. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think the Senator is submitting an absolutely invincible thesis, with which I find myself in complete accord. I want to ask his judgment respecting the argument made that when these banking facilities are withdrawn from the investment field there will be inadequate fiscal mechanism for industry, and, indeed, for government itself. Will the Senator comment on that suggestion?

Mr. BULKLEY. I shall be very glad to comment on that. It is a question which is not capable of an absolute demonstration one way or the other. Nobody can prove that the facilities will not be adequate, and I confess to some difficulty in absolute proof as to the adequacy of the facilities that will remain. But I can give the Senator some information about it.

It should be noted, in the first place, that with respect to the affiliate relationship we allow a period of three years for a reorganization to be made, and at the end of three years it is not required that the affiliates shall be dissolved or that they shall go out of business. It is only required that they shall be disassociated from the institutions taking commercial and savings deposits. So that it is conceivable that a large proportion of the so-called affiliates which are now engaged in the investment-banking business will have their facilities at the service of the public and entirely unimpaired during this 3-year period that is allowed, and even beyond that, if conditions should require and justify their going on in business—which they are permitted to do merely by separating their stock ownership from that of the ownership of the banks.

I want to submit one other consideration on that point. Something more than a year ago Mr. Charles E. Mitchell, president of the National City Co. of New York, appeared before the committee and gave us some figures as to originations and participations of issues of $20,000,000 or more during a series of four years. It appears from the table he submitted that in the year 1927 originations to the amount of 12.8 per cent were handled by banking affiliates, 78 per cent by private bankers, the balance by commercial banks and trust companies. I will not take the time to read them year by year, but the proportion of originations by bank affiliates gradually increases from year to year, and in 1930 the percentage handled by bank affiliates was 39.2 per cent, as compared with 12.8 per cent in 1927. For private bankers the percentage in 1930 was 55.4 per cent, as compared with 78 per cent in 1927.

Turning to participations, as distinguished from originations, participations of bank affiliates increased from 20.6 per cent in 1927 to 54.4 per cent in 1930, whereas participations by private bankers decreased from 63.2 per cent in 1927 to 38.8 per cent in 1930.

The reason for giving those figures is that it will readily be seen that the originations and participations by bank affiliates had a very rapid increase over the period of three years. Why is it not equally possible that the private banking institutions could recapture that business and expand themselves to meet any demand which may be needed in the course of the three years next ensuing after the enactment of this measure?

I think it may be taken as a safe expectation that all legitimate capital needs of the Nation will be met by institutions which will not be under any of the inhibitions of this bill.

Remember, too, that the overdevelopment of these investment affiliates has unquestionably been one of the causes of the overdevelopment of the capital market, which has brought upon us such disastrous consequences. In other words, it is not expected that the needs of the capital market will immediately be quite as great as they were assumed to be back in the boom years of 1928 and 1929.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I thank the Senator for his answer. I do not want to detour him, but I would like to submit this supplemental question: After all of the banking investment facilities are withdrawn and we have delivered the complete control of investments to so-called investment bankers, is it the Senator's view, as a result of his inquiries, that investment banking as such should be submitted to further and more drastic regulation than at present?

Mr. BULKLEY. That is a subject which our committee has not presumed to go into, and I should add, in that connection, that the purpose of this bill does not extend to safeguarding purchasers of securities as such. The purpose of this bill is to improve the operation of the Federal reserve system and the banks which are members of it. The object of the inhibitions which I am discussing here is not primarily to protect the investing public, although that is a worthy purpose, but our field is to protect the operations of the banking system itself, and to protect the depositors and customers of the banks so that they shall have the service from national and State member banks which they are entitled to expect.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BULKLEY. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. I address myself to the Senator from Ohio, conscious, as I am, of his complete knowledge of this bill, a fact to which the distinguished Senator from Michigan has just alluded, as a result of his research and information on the subject. I assume the word "affiliate" to the ordinary mind means a branch, but I take it that it is about as unintelligible to the ordinary citizen as the word "rediscount" is. But I would like to ask the Senator whether he can point out what provision in the measure, if any, he regards as looking to the protection and preservation of the depositors who deposit in these institutions called "affiliates" or in the main banks, in view of the disasters they have lately gone through and the vast losses which they have endured?

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I call to the attention of the Senator the fact that the word "affiliate," as used in this measure, is defined in section 2.

As to the protection of the depositors, we believe in general that most of the provisions of the measure tend to better protection of the depositors. Section 3, which the Senator from Virginia discussed at length this morning, refers to keeping the funds of Federal reserve banks out of speculative uses. We regard that as protection for depositors.

The Senator from Virginia also alluded to the formation of a liquidating corporation, which was not by any means a guaranty of bank deposits, but which is an assurance to depositors of member banks that they will be able to get promptly so much of their money as they may be entitled to at all in the event of a bank being closed. We regard that as some protection to depositors. But, in my humble opinion, the greatest protection to depositors that we have given in this measure is in connection with the very provision I have been here discussing, by prohibiting a banker from having an interest contrary to his depositors, by prohibiting him from being interested in securities which he recommends his depositor to buy, by keeping him in such position that he may be free and independent to pass on credits without the embarrassment of having brought back to him the very securities that he sold to his depositors and being asked to loan upon them. We feel that by removing the bankers from the temptation of using credit in such a way as to make a good background and foundation for the flotation for more security issues we are protecting the depositors. In other words, I would hesitate to point to any one thing in the bill that was intended to protect depositors, but I would rather say that the measure as a whole is in all of its fiber intended as a protection for depositors.

Mr. President, I have practically concluded what I have to say——

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. BULKLEY. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. Let me ask the Senator to refer to the language in lines 5 to 10 on page 8. I wish to ask the Senator a question about that provision. It is as follows:

> State member banks shall be subject to the same limitations and conditions with respect to the purchasing, selling, underwriting, and holding of investment securities and stock as are applicable in the case of national banks under paragraph "seventh" of section 5136 of the Revised Statutes, as amended.

The question I wish to ask of the Senator is, Is not that provision with reference to member banks operative in futuro by reference to the amended section 5136 of the Revised Statutes?

Mr. BULKLEY. I think the Senator means with respect to securities that may be held for investment account?

Mr. GEORGE. That may be held by a State member bank at the time of the passage of this bill. I may say to the Senator from Ohio that I am anxious to have his view upon it. I have conferred with the author of the bill and he assures me that the provision is applicable in futuro.

Mr. BULKLEY. I feel very clear about it. If the Senator will indulge me I think I can demonstrate it. Of course, all it provides on page 8 is that State member banks shall be subject to the same limitations and conditions as are applicable in the case of national banks under paragraph seventh of section 5136 of the Revised Statutes, as amended. Paragraph seventh of section 5136 is amended by this very bill. Section 14 of the bill, commencing on page 34, amends section 5136 of the Revised Statutes. The wording of section 14 shows the reenactment of paragraph seventh of section 5136. The new matter begins in line 15 on page 34 of the bill. On page 35 there are some reenactments, and also some new matter, but the only limitations on what banks may hold for their investment accounts are two. One of them begins in line 5:

> But in no event shall the total amount of any issue of investment securities of any one obligor or maker hereafter purchased and held by the association—

And I there emphasize the word "hereafter"—

> hereafter purchased and held by the association for its own account exceed at any time 10 per cent of the total amount of such issue outstanding.

Then down below it provides:

> Nor shall the amount of the investment securities of any one obligor or maker hereafter purchased and held—

Again I emphasize the word "hereafter"— > hereafter purchased and held by the association for its own account exceed at any time 15 per cent of the amount of the capital stock of the association actually paid in—

And so forth. I think it very clear that paragraph seventh of section 5136 as here amended is entirely in futuro with respect to securities purchased and held, and that it would relate back to the provisions to which the Senator has called attention on page 8.

Mr. GEORGE. Yes; the distinguished Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], author of the bill, assured me that that is the correct interpretation, and I was anxious to see whether the Senator from Ohio agreed with that view.

Will the Senator give me his opinion upon the following provision appearing on page 40 of the bill?—

> (b) After January 1, 1935, every such holding-company affiliate (1) shall possess, and shall continue to possess during the life of such permit, free and clear of the lien, pledge, or hypothecation of any nature, readily marketable assets other than bank stock in an amount not less than 12 per cent of the aggregate par value of all bank stocks controlled by such holding company affiliate, which amount shall be increased by not less than 2 per cent per annum of such aggregate par value until such assets shall amount to 25 per cent of the aggregate par value of such bank stocks; and (2) shall reinvest in readily marketable assets other than bank stock all net earnings over and above 6 per cent per annum on the book value of its own shares outstanding until such assets shall amount to 25 per cent of the aggregate par value of all bank stocks controlled by it.

The question I wish to direct to the Senator is whether the bank is required to accumulate, as provided in the section which I have just read, 25 per cent under No. 1, and a reserve equal to 25 per cent of the aggregate par value of all bank stocks controlled by it under No. 2? In other words, whether 50 per cent of the aggregate par value of all bank stock controlled by such holding company affiliate is required, or whether it is the intention of the bill to require only 25 per cent? Have I made my question clear?

Mr. BULKLEY. I will be very frank with the Senator that I am not quite certain myself. That is not one of the subjects that was under my personal purview. I would be glad if the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] would feel that he could answer the question.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator from Virginia advised me off the floor that he himself did not have direct supervision of this particular section; that is, he had not given particular study to the language.

Mr. BULKLEY. I will undertake to get an answer for the Senator, but I would rather not give it offhand.

Mr. GEORGE. Let me state the question in this way——

Mr. BULKLEY. I understand the question perfectly; but I would rather give the Senator a considered and reliable answer, which I am not able to do now.

Mr. GEORGE. If 50 per cent is required, I do not believe the language is quite clear. If only 25 per cent is required, it still may be said that it is not quite explicitly stated.

Mr. BULKLEY. I agree with the Senator that it ought to be made more clear.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. BULKLEY. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. It seems to me that the provision in the bill for the liquidating corporation, which has been stated to be for the protection of depositors, is to a very great extent for their protection, but it really ought to be stated that it will benefit them rather than protect them.

Mr. BULKLEY. I think perhaps the word "benefit" is better than "protect." It protects the depositor against having his funds tied up for an inordinate length of time. But I cheerfully accept the correction of the Senator from Florida. I think the word "benefit" is better.

Mr. President, I have concluded what I desired to say. I believe that the Senate will make no mistake in keeping the sections to which I have been referring substantially as they are, in order that we may not go forward to what may be merely building up again for a recurrence of the unfortunate events that we have had in the past.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio permit me to interrupt him?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. BULKLEY. Certainly.

Mr. JONES. I asked the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] about this outside the Chamber, but did not get an opportunity to ask him on the floor. I would like to get the Senator's judgment. I have a telegram from one of the leading bankers of Seattle. I think he is one of our most reliable bankers. He said:

> We have made careful study of Glass bill and are in favor of all provisions except section 14, pertaining to investment securities. Feel that bill should permit national banks to maintain bond departments and distribute such securities as are eligible for their own account, with limitations and restrictions by comptroller.

What answer would the Senator make to that suggestion?

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, as I indicated at the beginning of my remarks, that is a question on which honorable men might take a different view from mine. I have no quarrel with anyone who thinks the banks ought to be continued in the investment-securities business, but I have endeavored to give to the Senate my reason for believing that it makes a divided interest in the allegiance of a bank to its customers, and that it is not in accord with what we know human nature to be to expect that a bank shall have securities for sale on which it makes a profit and at the same time be competent to advise its customers with respect to their investments. My own view is very strongly that the Senator from Washington should plead with his friend to reconsider his view and ask him whether the banks would not be relieved of a great deal of embarrassment and a great deal of the loss of confidence from which they now suffer if they were prohibited from carrying on that sort of business, which puts them on the opposite side of transactions from their own customers.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. BULKLEY. Certainly.

Mr. GLASS. I may supplement what my colleague on the committee has just said by referring to that remarkable opinion which the Senate yesterday made a public document. Mr. Lehmann, the Solicitor General, speaks of that sort of thing as a vain attempt to fairly serve two masters, and that it can not be done.

Still further I would say to the Senator from Washington that the mistaken impression prevails that there is some deflationary degree in section 14 of the bill, whereas if he will examine it critically he will see that it relates to future transactions and does not require a single bank to discharge any of its existing investments.

There can be no question, though there is a controversial element in it, that it is not a safe business for a commercial bank to be engaged in investment banking. They ought to be entirely separate.

Let me add—and my colleague will confirm the statement—that those bankers who came to Washington and went to night schools and got their lessons one after another made the same objection to section 14. However, when it was pointed out to them that they had a misconception of its meaning, that it did not involve any deflation of their existing assets, that it related solely to the future, without exception they acquiesced in it as a sound measure and abated their objection to that section.

Mr. JONES. I thank the Senator for that opinion with reference to this matter. I myself have no opinion in regard to it, and I am perfectly willing to take the Senator's judgment.

Mr. BULKLEY. I should say to the Senator that there was no objection whatever at the hearings to the limitation with respect to securities held for a bank's investment account. We have never had a complete agreement on the general subject of whether banks ought to be permitted to continue in the securities business.

Mr. JONES. In this telegram it is stated further:

> Please secure interpretation of page 35, line 2, that "the association may purchase for its own account investment securities under such limitations and restrictions as comptroller may by regulation prescribe," and ascertain whether or not this provision would permit national banks to sell and distribute as well as purchase through well-regulated bond departments; otherwise, we believe that the security markets generally as well as the condition of all collateral owned would be greatly impaired.

Will the Senator give me his opinion with reference to that statement?

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I am very clear that the language quoted has reference to the purchase by banks of securities to be held for investment in their own portfolios. Banks have always held a certain amount of bonds and other securities as investments, as a so-called secondary reserve. This provision relates only to the purchase for such investment account. I am clear that my view of this would cause the Senator's correspondent to be opposed to the section, but, nevertheless, I believe that what the language refers to is the regulation of purchases of securities for investment for the bank's own account and not for distribution in the sense to which reference is made in the telegram.

Mr. JONES. I thank the Senator.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Earlier in the day I submitted an amendment to the pending bill and asked that it lie on the table and be printed. I now offer the amendment and ask that it may be considered as the pending amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Michigan offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed to amend section 19 by adding at the end of subsection C, on page 45, the following:

> Provided, That only existing unit or affiliated banks shall become branch banks, except that this proviso shall not apply in any city, town, or village where no national or State banking corporation is regularly transacting customary banking business.

Mr. DICKINSON. I offer an amendment to the pending bill, which I ask to have printed and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa will be printed and lie on the table.

THE GLASS BANKING BILL—EDITORIAL FROM FORT WORTH STAR-TELEGRAM

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial from the Fort Worth (Tex.) Star-Telegram in relation to the bill which the Senate is now considering.

There being no objection, the article was ordered printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Fort Worth (Tex.) Star-Telegram, May 1, 1932]

FUNDAMENTAL ERRORS OF THE GLASS BANKING BILL

Although the Glass banking bill as now pending in the Senate is a very much less dangerous measure than that first introduced, it still contains many features objectionable from the standpoint of practical banking, and it continues subject to two fundamental charges of error. Of the latter, the most important is found in the bill's apparent assumption that the human element may be expunged from banking, or that, failing this, human responsibility may be attained in more desirable form merely by shifting from one set of individuals to another. This error is the more glaring since the individuals from whom responsibility would be taken are the bank officials who obviously have a more direct concern with the interests of their customers and their communities, while those upon whom this additional responsibility would be conferred are members of a board isolated in Washington. That mistakes are possible even for the Federal Reserve Board is suggested by the fact that this board is frequently charged with responsibility for the wild speculation and consequent collapse in 1929, the board's "easy-money" policy being blamed.

The second general error of banking policy which may be proved against the present Glass bill is the fact that it would so militate against continued membership in the reserve system on the part of State banks that it likely would drive out of the system institutions now contributing 40 per cent of its resources. The provisions of the bill in this respect involve a direct breach of contract with the State banks now members. During the war period when added strength was vitally needed by the reserve system, a special effort was made to induce State banks to become members as a patriotic duty. In order that the State banks might not be required to surrender their charter rights entirely, an understanding was reached which assured member banks under State charters a reasonable autonomy and freedom of action. This understanding would be forcibly abrogated, without consent of one of the parties, by the Glass bill, which would require State banks members of the reserve system to be entirely subservient to the Comptroller of the Currency and the Federal Reserve Board. In addition, by its branch-banking provisions, the bill would place member State banks at a disadvantage, since these would be prohibited by their State charters from establishing branches in other States, a practice which would be permitted to national banks. These two requirements, in the opinion of bankers, would force nearly all State banks out of the reserve system.

For more than two years the country has been struggling with the most difficult and complicated business situation in its history. Many important readjustments seem necessary and desirable. But granting that some changes are desirable in existing laws, the present, when we are just emerging from an atmosphere of hysteria and fear which was the inevitable consequence of the period, would hardly seem a propitious time for enacting new and far-reaching provisions which in their very nature are excessively deflationary. It would be unfortunate if we were now to rush in and attempt to cure evils of the past year by means which, even if they proved helpful at some future time, would inevitably add to the length and depth of the present depression.

The fact that three years ago an unduly large amount of credit was extended to stock-market operators by member banks and nonmember banks, as well as by corporations and individuals over whom bankers had no control, should not now cause us to go to the other extreme and enact a law which would make all the legitimate investment business an outlaw business by practically preventing banks from extending credit to anyone engaged in that line. Nor should the fact that in the past a few banks went too deeply into the securities market be now used as an argument for prohibiting all banks from dealing in sound investment bonds.

In attempting to prevent a repetition of old mistakes in this line the Glass bill would permit new and greater errors by destroying all machinery for the distribution of long-term securities, which is, after all, an essential part of the Nation's financial business and therefore an important public service. Wrecking this machinery would be a sorry service to States, counties, and municipalities, as well as to railroads and other corporations whose legitimate need for long-term credit must be recognized. It would also deprive business and industry of what is right now its chief reliance for the ultimate act of aid in breaking through the depression. Before business can be restored the investment market will be called upon not only to finance new undertakings but also to absorb bank loans and obligations that have been taken over by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. If banks members of the Federal reserve system are prohibited from participating in this necessary work, not only will the opportunities for business rescue be reduced but the work of refinancing will be taken away from institutions under supervision and turned over to private institutions over which there is no public control.

It is impossible to escape the conclusion that the effects of this bill would be entirely opposed to the purpose of the two most important reconstruction acts undertaken by Congress this year—the Reconstruction Finance act and the Glass-Steagall Act. These measures, a product of broad-minded and nonpartisan statesmanship of the leaders of both parties, have done much to reestablish national confidence on the part of bankers and the public. The passage of this bill undoubtedly would destroy most, if not all, the good that has been accomplished along this line and would lead to further deflation of securities and additional restrictions on credit at a time when just the opposite influences are needed.

EXTRAVAGANCE OF GOVERNMENTAL EXPENDITURES—ADDRESS BY ROBERT R. M'CORMICK

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, some days ago Col. Robert R. McCormick, the very able editor of the Chicago Tribune, delivered an address over the radio, April 16, on the subject of governmental expenditures. I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The cause of the world-wide depression has been definitely and finally traced to the extravagance of governmental expenditures since the war.

That is the one common denominator found in all countries, defeated, victorious, or neutral, in all forms of government, monarchist, republican, socialist, dictatorship; in every clime, on every continent, and in every State, county, and city.

All governments are either bankrupt or on the road to bankruptcy. Among them we find Germany, Austria, England, Australia, and New Zealand perhaps beyond recovery, and the rest pointing to the same end.

Among cities, Chicago, Detroit, and Philadelphia are known to be bankrupt, but New York City is utterly insolvent. With a debt approaching $2,000,000,000, an outgo far exceeding income, she is increasing her expenditures constantly. One wonders how much longer the banks and the insurance companies of New York will dare to loan money to finance wasteful public business. Her budget for 1932 was $631,000,000. Since 1920 our largest city has much more than doubled its budget. This year's deficit will reach $100,000,000 by June. Cleveland has a deficit of $2,000,000 in her general fund and $2,000,000 in her educational fund, and her credit has gone sour.

Boston is so much older than our mid-western cities that she ought to know better. However, according to William H. Davies, writing in the Boston Herald, she permitted her city officers last year to spend $10,000,000 more than they had ever spent before. And thus she has a deficit of at least $5,000,000 for this year.

Mayor Curley telegraphs me that the overexpenditures exceeded my figures by $2,000,000, but that the deficit is $2,500,000 less, and that he expects to collect it from the $11,000,000 of taxes in default. I trust he is justified in his hopefulness, but defaulted taxes of such enormous proportions in a city the size of Boston would seem to indicate a tax strike. I am afraid that Boston will soon join the ranks of the other bankrupts.

Such is the plight of the larger cities, but the smaller ones have not done better. In 28 States there are known to be defaults. In the others it is just a question of time. Defaults and repudiations are the order of the day in government as a result of submersion in debts beyond ability to pay.

National expenditures are exceeding income by 100 per cent, or $2,000,000,000.

The United States Senate sits smugly on the horns of the dilemma it seems to have chosen—whether to fail to meet the Nation's obligations or to levy taxes which will destroy the entire economic structure of the country as the House has done. No serious thought of retrenchment appears to have entered the heads of our office-holding tyrants.

Not since the States ratified the Federal Constitution has there been so dark an outlook—in all the history of our people.

If we are to save ourselves from the threatened cataclysm, we must find by what steps we were led into this morass, that we may learn how to retrace them.

Time will not permit me to detail the rise of bureaucracy in this country which, hardly noticeable for the first century of our existence, may have found its germ in the vast activities of government in the Civil War, because it was in the following generation that government expansion got its start.

Before Europe went to war there had been added to the constitutional offices a Department of the Interior, a Department of Justice, a Civil Service Commission, an Interstate Commerce Commission, a Department of Agriculture, Department of Commerce, a Bureau of Forestry, a Department of Labor, the Federal Reserve Board, and the Federal Trade Commission. Between them and our declaration of war arrived the National Advisory Commission for Aeronautics, the Employees' Compensation Commission, the Tariff Commission, and the Federal Board for Vocational Education.

The act creating the last-named board was innocent enough in appearance. It provided for Federal assistance on a 50-50 basis to States which would match the Federal Government gift to them in expenditures for teaching in the schools, boys to become machinists and carpenters, and girls to do fancywork. But that entering wedge opened the way for the shiftless States to spend the money of the thrifty ones, with the National Government providing half the funds. That was the means through which Ohio money came to be taken to build roads in Utah. That is the means through which citizens of Philadelphia contribute to the culinary education of Alabama farmer ladies.

But we are getting ahead of our story. Federal Government expenditures, which increased quite steadily prior to the war, did so at a rate that might cause the Democratic and Progressive Parties of 1912 to view with alarm, but they were still very moderate. Less than a billion dollars paid for everything the Congressmen could get each other to vote for. Less than a billion took care of the Army and the Navy, the postal deficit, the Panama Canal, and all the waste.

Nineteen fourteen was the first year that Federal Government expenditures went over a billion dollars, and by 1916, a year before we declared war, the total was only a billion forty-two million. But at that time there were fewer than 40,000 Federal employees in Washington and fewer than 400,000 outside of Washington. At the beginning of the present fiscal year the number of civil employees was the largest in any peace-time year, 72,000 in Washington, 545,000 outside of Washington.

It was, however, the Great War that changed the entire scale of national income and national expenditure.

First the prices of agricultural products soared. Cotton mounted from 7 cents to 43 cents a pound and wheat from 80 cents to $3.50 a bushel. Although the value of cotton was due entirely to the temporary demand for explosives and the demand for wheat was caused by the drafting of European farm workers into armies and the shortage of shipping which prevented South American and Australian competition, farm lands advanced in price, as though farm incomes would be permanently stabilized on a war basis.

Next factories making war material boomed, and factories which could be turned to war manufacture zoomed after them. In consequence factories unadaptable for war manufactures became insufficient to supply the civilian needs of the country, and the demand exceeding supply brought the inevitable high prices of nearly all commodities, while so-called prosperity and the high cost of living brought about increase of wages on an average of 172 per cent.

Neither financiers nor soldiers had thought that the enormous armies prepared in Europe could be supported for more than a few weeks of war, and the various war plans of general staffs all aimed at an early victory. The Schlieffen plan of Germany, plan 17 of France, the Conrad plan of Austria, and the Yonouskevitch plan of Russia all aimed at this result, and all failed because the book-trained staffs had no conception of modern combat.

It was only when the war settled into a siege that the world perceived for the first time to what extent credit could be extended and to what taxes men and industries would submit under the impulse of pariotism.

During three years Europe pinched and fought while we merely increased our production, our cost of production, and our cost of living. When finally we declared war we felt rich; some felt a sense of moral delinquency because we had not entered the war earlier, and all realized that we had incurred a national peril.

We found it necessary to raise our soldiers by conscription, and this led to the moral consequence that the unconscripted could deny them nothing. There followed an organized reign of terror against all criticism. We had organized propaganda, censorship, and a cheka. These were used to fight enemies at home and abroad, and were used just as much to prevent criticism, encourage extravagance, and protect corruption.

In their shadow unscrupulous men sought unconscionable contracts, harbor appropriations, camp locations, and the many spoils of war and politics. Side by side with necessary war activities were perpetrated the grossest frauds in the history of the world up to that time.

Those for whom room was not found in the Army or Navy the cry was raised, "Give till it hurts. Buy bonds till it hurts. Pay taxes till it hurts." And no one complained.

They raised sums more vast than mathematicians had imagined possible, and they set a standard of taxation and extravagance in government which has finally brought this country to the verge of ruin.

They established enormous organizations for the collection and expenditure of taxes and for the creation and enlargement of public debt.

Naturally, at the end of the war the jobholders and the industries which had been created from war conditions wished to continue; the honest as well as the dishonest, and the dishonest as well as the honest.

Those that could not remain in the Federal service flowed over into the States, the counties, and the cities.

The habit of exuberant and exorbitant taxation continued and was borne by a people who had been taught to bear it under the stress of national necessity. The propagandists found new euphemisms for public expenditures in civil life to take the place of patriotism and self-sacrifice for unnecessary waste in war time.

The greatest postwar thefts of public funds have been camouflaged as desirable projects or indispensable services.

One weapon of the peace-time propagandists has been to direct the public attitude toward war-time profiteering, for which they were largely responsible, against necessary peace-time industries. There was a natural antipathy toward the men who got rich from war necessities. Progressive taxation was imposed no mere to provide revenue than to punish the profiteers. Tax thieves have perpetuated this attitude and have hamstrung essential industries and forced millions of workingmen out of employment on the generalization that private profit, however honestly gained and however indispensable to the common welfare, should be penalized.

Before the war our public expenditures were $3,000,000,000 per year, including State and local governments. Five years after the war they exceeded $10,000,000,000. The total public expenditures for 1931 exceeded $14,000,000,000!

Nor must you be hoodwinked with that utterly false statement that the largest part of this sum is spent on war, because only 17 per cent of the National Government's expenditures is even appropriated in the name of the Army and Navy Departments.

The general result is that we now have on the public pay rolls over 3,000,000 people, and we have allied with them, in the form of contractors and other beneficiaries—I can not say how many millions more.

Before the war our national indebtedness, including States and counties, was $4,850,000,000, while in 1922, four years after the war, it had risen to $31,000,000,000. Between 1922 and 1930 the Federal debt had been cut by $6,700,000,000, but borrowings of States and cities had more than offset the Federal amortization. Now the debts of all our governments aggregate about $35,000,000,000.

These costs seemed bearable because of the steep, if temporary, increase in values of all kinds.

The inflations of values began with farm land during war time, and then like a pulse passed through all other land—Florida land, subdivision land, conservative business property, and even the houses in which we live. Inflation went through the securities listed on the exchanges, and the owners of property not on the market felt a glow of wealth which they could not realize upon, to be sure, but upon which they were not loath to pay increasing taxation.

How to account for this phenomenon I am not sure. Increased income from property was responsible for but a small part. The effect of spending borrowed money had some share. The energy created by war enthusiasm and the natural optimism following victory all contributed.

The consequence has been that property of every kind was raised, as a ship on a wave, and left by the receding wave high and dry on the jagged rocks of ruinous taxation.

Earnings never were high enough to support the levels of taxation which were imposed. The unbearable load was concealed, like the face of Mephistopheles, behind a mask of plenty.

Now, under the grinding load of taxation, industry is everywhere slowing up. Incomes are falling and disappearing. Industries, contracting or closing down altogether, are unable to furnish employment to workmen. Everywhere we find economies and hardship excepting on the part of those people who have their hands under color of law, in the pockets of others, and even these are suffering as the pockets become empty.

They are like the wolves of Anticosti. That island was populated by limitless droves of caribou until one year Labrador wolves were carried to it on the ice. The island was favorable to the pursuit of wolves, and its shores prevented the escape of the pursued. The wolves waxed in number, destroyed the caribou, and then, with nothing to feed upon, all died of hunger. That is the prospect which lies before our tax eaters.

The evil talk of tax strikes is heard throughout the land, but far more serious than strikes is the growing inability of taxpayers to pay. Strike or no strike, it is absolutely impossible to pay the taxes assessed. Owners of buildings are tearing them down because the taxes are more than the receipts. Owners of unimproved property are unable to pay their taxes, and tax buyers can not be found to evict them. Individuals, estates, and corporations are beginning to find it impossible to meet Federal taxation extorted with all the ruthlessness of the Germans in Belgium.

We have reached the extraordinary situation where the ownership of property has become a liability, not an asset.

Ever since the war the Government has been living on and living off income taxes and taxes that it called "income" taxes. Where the taxes were levied on profit in the purchase and sale of a fixed article, such as a piece of real estate, or a certificate representing the ownership of a company owning real estate, improved or unimproved, a railroad or a factory, the tax is not on income, but is a capital levy. This fact is recognized in the proposed tax law under which losses in the resale of such property may not be deducted.

Obviously, by the continuation of the principle of taxes, exacting tribute on values as they rise and conceding nothing when they decline, sooner or later the Government will have extorted the entire value of all property.

It will be like the fisherman who, hauling in his line as the fish comes his way, and snubbing his line when the fish would run, soon has him gaffed. If I were inclined to pun on so serious an occasion, I would continue the illustration and say the American taxpayer is a "poor fish."

Now, as to taxes on incomes proper. It being the evident purpose of our Government to take away from its citizens, like the Roman conquerors from their subject peoples, all their property in so far as it is profitable for the Government to do so—how far can the taxes be extended before they destroy the source of income?

Here we enter a less defined field of political economy, but there is ample evidence visible to those willing to see. The great industrial enterprises which pay so large a part of all kinds of taxes, real, personal, and income, employ so many men and women, buy such quantities of primary products, started from small beginnings and have been built up from accumulations. If these accumulations had been sequestered in the past, as they will be in the future, the industries never could have grown. If we stop accumulation at this time, no more industries may grow to take up the slack of unemployment and to pay the cost of government.

A no less vital factor is the repayment of debts. The existence of banks, and hence the existence of bank depositors, depends upon the ability of debtors to pay. To the nonproducing theorist a strictly limited return on capital may seem sufficient and all that is morally justified for some one else to receive, but for the borrower a return sufficient to pay not only the interest but the principal of his debt is necessary lest he lose his all. If the opportunity of repaying his debt is denied him, he can not venture, and if the Government will take from the borrower the money which is needed to repay the lender, the bank dare not lend. We can have no banks.

Nothing is more popular to-day among the human crocodiles than the progressive estate tax. If, they argue, it is fair that the creator of wealth is entitled to its use, this right does not extend to his heirs who did not produce it—an argument plausible to those who wish to see it that way, but one which, carried to its logical conclusion, injures the very people it is supposed to benefit.

Modern property is no longer in the patriarchal stage. The rich man does not own 1,000 goats or 10,000 sheep, of which 500 or 7,000 may be taken by Pharaoh, still leaving the heirs a considerable quantity of mutton and wool.

In its simplest form, for the taxgatherer, this wealth will be found represented in bonds and shares of stocks listed on an exchange, a part of which can be sold to pay the tax on the whole. Forced sales of stocks to pay taxes are another form of bear raids, or short selling. Stock which in the natural order of events would be kept off the market will be forced on the market, breaking the market. The forced sale of the stock sold destroys the value of that retained, and any glee caused by the confiscation of the estate of a rich man will be turned to dismay when it is found out that all stock, in whosoever hands it may be, is thereby depreciated in value. Not only every share of the particular stock sold will be depreciated, but as these shares fall in value they will bring all the other shares down with them. The recent collapse of the stock market is partly due to stocks forced upon the market by Government exactions and for which buyers are wanting, and the same is true of all depreciated values.

But more difficult than this by far will be the case of the many businesses of one kind or another which are operating successfully, employing labor, buying supplies, and paying taxes, which are not listed on any stock exchange and which in many cases do not consist of capital stock. The machinery and fixtures can not be separated and sold piece by piece. They would produce nothing. Assuming an enterprise to have a given value in the hands of its owner, say, one million or ten million dollars, how much will it bring at a forced sale, a sale forced upon the citizen by his government? How much will the individual so fortunately situated as to have his competitor's property auctioned off to him by the Federal Government bid for it? Will he bid its fair value? Will he bid its value as fixed by Cæsar's legates, and if he bids less, will the Government demand a tax on a larger sum that it realizes for its victim? And how long will enterprises exist if they are to be overtaxed during the generation of their founder and confiscated with his death?

Look across the ocean! Look at England, the founder of industrial civilization, the originator of steam machinery. There you will see industries of all kinds groaning along on out-of-date, worn-out machines, incapable of competition in the world markets. Why do the English endeavor to manufacture with out-of-date, worn-out machinery? Because taxation has risen to such heights in England that the owners can not afford to modernize their plants. What money the Englishman can get he puts in hiding, in a losing effort to maintain his declining civilization.

The course which our rulers have laid out for us, and from which they show no sign of deviating, is the road to complete and inescapable ruin. If they proceed as they are going, they will dry up every profit, every interest payment, and every pay roll. They will bring upon us a fall like the fall of the Dutch Republic and of the Roman Empire. And with our ruin their ruin is also inextricably bound up.

If you ask me what is the alternative, I will make this statement and I will continue to proclaim it: There is not a Cabinet officer, there is not a Member of Congress, who can demonstrate that one-half of the money appropriated for any department of government is used for the purpose designated. I will be specific: not one-half of the money appropriated for the War Department is spent to make an army; not one-half of the money appropriated for the Navy Department is spent to build, operate, and maintain a combat fleet; not one-half of the money appropriated for the Post Office Department is spent to move the mails. As for other great branches of the Government—the Department of Commerce, the Department of the Interior, the Department of Agriculture, are not much better than rackets. Rackets, I regret to say, which are supported by small elements of our population, persuaded that they are receiving from them special benefits at the expense of the general taxpayer.

It took centuries for enough wealth to accumulate to raise our civilization from the misery of the Middle Ages to the high estate we have witnessed. It has taken 15 years of excessive taxation to bring us down to the verge of ruin. The tax bill passed by the National House destroys all hope for the future.

Like the French under Louis XV, we are ground down by an unbearable army which is extorting in taxes from the suffering populace $10,000,000,000 annually, and is spending $4,000,000,000 more, so that local treasuries are largely bankrupt and the Federal credit is stretched to the breaking point. Everywhere people are crying for relief, and nowhere are they receiving it, while smug officeholders quote "After us, the deluge."

If you are to exist you must tear these weasels from the throat of the Nation. To attend meetings is not enough; to pass resolutions is not enough. You will have to go into every detail of political organization. If you do less, you will be destroyed.

Since the passage of the new tax bill by the House of Representatives we read that $6,000,000,000 have been lost in stocks listed on the exchange. Forty thousand farms have been sold for taxes in Mississippi. There has been a bloody riot in Newfoundland, an insurrection in New Zealand, Australia is leaning over the brink of civil war. The prospect is dark, indeed.

But we are the descendants of the people who dared the trackless ocean and the impenetrable forests and who, in the face of obstacles greater by far than those which we face to-day, overthrew a tyrant king and established the greatest Nation in the world.

We face a threat and accept the challenge. There are serious times ahead, but I am confident that the American spirit will yet save our country.

A gathering of patriotic citizens of Aurora, Ill., anxious about the future of their country and inspired by its past, yesterday asked me to point out to you that of the many organizations wielding influence upon public office for good or ill, all are limited in their membership by class, trade, or previous experience, and all are favoring special causes. There is no organization as wide as America and none devoted exclusively to the public welfare. They ask me to suggest that there be organized throughout this country an association of Americans with no other limitation than that of American citizenship; that its Constitution shall forbid its advocacy of any special interest whatsoever, and that it shall devote and confine its activities to the general welfare. Remembering the organization which freed the Colonies from foreign oppression and made it possible to establish this Nation, they suggest that we call it the Patriots.

Listeners all over the land, if this suggestion receives your favor, will you write and tell me? If you disapprove of the suggestion, will you do the same? And if you have other ideas to save us from our peril let me have those also. The danger is nigh and the time is short.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, MAY 10, 1932

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, may we ever covet that strength and courage of Him who trod the wine press alone. Be Thou the food for our meditation, the staff for our feet, the light for our eyes, and the wisdom for our understanding. Willingly and courageously may we always identify ourselves with the great causes for which our Government stands. Let us never shrink from any burden that implies the good and the stability of the Republic. Endue us with spiritual and mental vigor that strikes weakness out of our breasts and that holds us from the compromising levels of life. O thrust us into those great movements which are designed to cross the horizons of our souls and which yield their reverence for God, for home, and for native land. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

IMMIGRATION.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 6477) to further amend the naturalization laws, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments, disagree to the Senate amendments, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, when the gentleman last made his request I had not had time to examine the various amendments. I have since examined them and find that they were given very little consideration in the Senate. I have no objection to the amendments except the amendment known as section 8, which seeks to authorize the Bureau of Naturalization to compile statistics which belong to the Bureau of the Census. I simply wish to state my position. It is that amendment that is objectionable, because the expense may run into thousands of dollars. I am willing to agree to all except section 8.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The Speaker appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. DICKSTEIN, Mr. MOORE of Kentucky, and Mr. JOHNSON of Washington.

MEMORIAL EXERCISES

Mr. MOREHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I send the following resolution to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 219

Resolved, That on Wednesday, May 25, 1932, immediately after the approval of the Journal, the House shall stand at recess for the purpose of holding the memorial services as arranged by the Committee on Memorials under the provisions of clause 40a of Rule XI. The order of exercises and proceedings of the service shall be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and all Members shall be given the privilege of extending their remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. At the conclusion of the proceedings the Speaker shall call the House to order and then, as a further mark of respect to the memories of the deceased, he shall declare the House adjourned.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. WHITLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD a letter to me by Gen. Douglas MacArthur, Chief of Staff.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. WHITLEY. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter written to me by Gen. Douglas MacArthur, Chief of Staff of the United States Army:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF STAFF,
Washington, D. C., May 9, 1932.

Hon. JAMES L. WHITLEY,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. WHITLEY: Replying to your inquiry wherein you ask if any reports have been received at the War Department in reference to communistic meetings in your district, I beg to advise you that the following message has been received in reference to a meeting held Friday evening, May 6, showing that the communists of that section are taking an active part in fighting the pending Army appropriation bill. I give you the message in full as follows:

"Smith Street communist meeting held Friday evening, May 6, was jubilant at the prospect of probable cut in military budget.

"Miss Gertrude Walsh (Welch) addressed the meeting and urged the sending of more fictitious telegrams signed Jones, Wentworth, Adams, Brown, Douglas, etc., to Members of Congress.

"Communists here are preparing special posters showing red flag of victory to celebrate the destruction of the Army of the United States."

Very sincerely yours,

DOUGLAS MACARTHUR,
General, Chief of Staff.

SOLDIERS' ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House not to exceed 15 minutes, for the purpose of giving the legislative history of the consideration of the bonus bill before the Ways and Means Committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, in view of what has been said by my distinguished and good friend from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY] as to the action of the Ways and Means Committee in making an adverse report on the bill for adjusted-service-certificate payments in full, as acting chairman of that committee, it is my duty to give you the facts relative to the consideration of that bill by the Ways and Means Committee.

Now, I have no criticism or fault to find with any Member who advocates the payment of the bonus. I say they are just as sincere as I am, and are acting as they think for the best interests of the country.

This Congress convened on the 7th of December. On the 8th of December the Code of Rules was adopted, and those rules contain a great liberalization, providing for a discharge of committees from the consideration of bills that they do not report within 30 days. The rules are workable. The rules make it within the power of 145 Members to have a vote on any matter. The rules, as I said, were adopted on the 8th of December, and that particular rule—the discharge rule—was not fixed with reference solely to these adjusted-service certificate bills, or, for that matter, with reference to any other particular bill. The Committee on Ways and Means then immediately went to work trying to perfect the House organization by selecting the Democratic members of other committees, because, under our policy the Democrats of that committee constitute our committee on committees.

As soon as that was finished, the committee had hearings on the moratorium and passed that about the 18th of December. Immediately following that we took up the Democratic tariff bill, and we passed that; and then a day or two after that was passed, we started the hearings on what is the most important measure in my judgment pending before Congress—the tax bill to balance the Budget. We had six or seven weeks of hearings, and then as all know it took in the committee and in the House a month or more to finally dispose of that bill. Before the tax bill was concluded the Committee on Ways and Means had assured our friends, the proponents of the bonus measure, that they would be given the next hearings. When the tax bill was finished nearly every one in the House and especially on the Ways and Means Committee was exhausted, and I saw my friend from Texas, Mr. PATMAN, and others, and they said that they would be delighted if they could have a week intervene before their hearings, so that they could get the witnesses. That was done. When the committee convened to consider the bonus legislation, the committee gladly turned over to the Members of the House, friends of the legislation, the privilege of conducting the hearings so far as the proponents were concerned. They were very helpful. It was a splendid hearing, and those gentlemen put up witnesses as they saw fit, and when they concluded, the opposition had witnesses, and the committee met every day except Saturday. When the opposition concluded, the committee gladly accorded to the proponents the right to rebut. They took only a day or a day and a half, according to my recollection, and then the committee adjourned for one day so that the testimony of the last day of the hearings might be printed; and with just one day intervening after the hearings closed, the committee met in executive session, considered the bills, and the next day decided to report them adversely.

That same afternoon before the report was filed, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY] came to my office and asked if we could not reconsider and hold the bills in the committee so that they might file a discharge motion against the Committee on Ways and Means, stating that then they could get a vote on the matter by the 23d of May, and if we reported the matter adversely, and they had to file a discharge against the Rules Committee, it might be the 13th of June before it could be reached, and they wanted a vote. As acting chairman of that committee I endeavored to be courteous and fair and give every side every opportunity to present its case, because I knew the intense interest in it and the great importance of it. I did an unusual thing.

I told the gentleman from Texas and the gentleman from Massachusetts that I would call the committee in session the next morning to consider the question as to whether or not the committee desired to reconsider its action. I called the committee, because you know, under the rules of the House, and they are applicable to the committee, anyone who votes in the majority on the committee on the next legislative day has a right to enter a motion to reconsider. I considered it imperative to call the committee the next day because the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] was going to file an adverse report, and then it would be too late to enter a motion to reconsider. When the committee convened I stated to them the visit of my friends and called attention to the rule and stated the Chair was ready to entertain any motion to reconsider the action of the committee deciding to report the bills adversely. No one made that motion. That ended it.

Some of my friends, the proponents of the measure, complained that the committee did an unusual thing in making adverse reports. I have not investigated the RECORD to see how many adverse reports have been filed, if any; but I concede that it has not been the usual practice to make adverse reports, but the rules have always provided for adverse reports, and if gentlemen will go back 30 or 40 years they will see provision for adverse reports. But, Mr. Speaker, in my judgment, the amended rule changes the old order of things and does make it advisable for committees when they are opposed to legislation, and vote against legislation, to make an adverse report. Why? Because a workable, effective discharge rule will make it possible for 145 members desiring to vote on it to force the House to vote on a measure that a majority of the committee is opposed to. It will be seen that is the fundamental difference. The discharge rule is needed only to prevent a committee from smothering a bill in the committee room.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. I am informed that this is the first time, at least in 140 years, that the Ways and Means Committee has ever filed an adverse report on a bill. Is it not a fact that in the parliamentary bodies in America where committees do make adverse reports there is a provision in the rules to the effect that the bill may be called up on a minority report as well as on a majority report? My understanding is that in those parliamentary bodies in the United States where committees make adverse reports, those making minority reports have the right to call the bill up for consideration on a minority report.

Mr. CRISP. I can not answer, because I do not know; but I can say this: As far as the House of Representatives is concerned, a favorable report on this bill would not have been privileged, neither would an adverse report be privileged. You would have had to have unanimous consent to consider either or a special rule from the Committee on Rules.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR. In reference to the proposed petition to discharge on the bonus bill there has been quite a lot of talk among the Members, and to some of us it is not quite clear just what is the parliamentary situation.

Of course, a petition could not be lodged to discharge the Ways and Means Committee from further consideration of the bill, because that committee has finished its consideration and it has reported adversely. Does the gentleman agree with me that far?

Mr. CRISP. I do. I was about to address myself to that very proposition when I was interrupted.

Mr. O'CONNOR. And may I ask the gentleman to touch on this point: The next question is as to filing a petition to discharge the Rules Committee. That method is referred to in the second sentence in the discharge rule, which reads:

> Under this rule it shall also be in order for a Member to file a motion to discharge the Committee on Rules from further consideration of any resolution pending, either special order of business or special rule for the consideration of any public bill or resolution favorably reported. * * *

I call the gentleman's attention to the word "favorably" and trust he will discuss the situation arising from an adverse report.

Mr. CRISP. I understand the gentleman's point, and I was about to answer it. I will cover it in what I believe to be the right way, and what I advised the gentleman from Texas and what I advised the Speaker is the provision of that rule, its true intent and meaning.

Mr. PATMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. I yield.

Mr. PATMAN. I just want to state, as the one selected by the Members of the House to submit the case before the Ways and Means Committee for the proponents of this legislation, that the acting chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP], dealt fairly with us in every way. We have no cause for complaint as far as consideration is concerned. Each and every member of the committee, I believe, gave the proposal serious and careful consideration. They gave us all the time we wanted. We took six days in the beginning to present the case. The committee sat each morning at 10 o'clock and would adjourn at 12.30. After we had finished, the opponents of the proposal consumed nine days, and then we were offered all the time we wanted. Of course, we did not want to take much time, because it was to our disadvantage to take much time. We only took one day. But regardless of the action of the committee, we feel deeply grateful to the committee for the careful consideration shown the proposal which we presented to them.

Of course, as the gentleman from Georgia has suggested, there is a way open to us whereby we believe consideration can be given this proposal, and, of course, we expect to do everything in our power in order to see that the proposal is considered during the present session of Congress. We are to-day filing a rule with the Rules Committee which provides for a special order of business for the consideration of this legislation.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. CRISP. I thank my friend from Texas. I was about to say I think conditions have changed as to making an adverse report, with this new discharge rule, and it seems to me this is better practice. If a committee is opposed to a bill, is it not better for the committee to report it, giving the reasons why it opposes it, rather than to smother it in the committee? The smothering of bills in the committee is what led to the demand for the discharge rule.

Now, I do not think the proponents of this legislation are deprived of any substantial rights by virtue of the committee making an adverse report. When I drafted that discharge rule, I did my very best to prepare a rule that would work and that would place it within the power of 145 Members to force a vote; and I say to-day, in my judgment, it does it.

Now, answering the question of my friend, the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR], of course the discharge rule now does not apply against the Ways and Means Committee, which has reported the bill, but that discharge rule has two plans, and, as I have always believed, the most effective plan is a motion to discharge the Rules Committee. If I had been operating in favor of the legislation, to get a vote, even if the committee had not reported it, I would have operated through the Rules Committee.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. I do not want to be discourteous, but I would like to finish my statement.

Mr. O'CONNOR. If the committee has not reported, how could that be done?

Mr. CRISP. Well, it could be done under the rule. That is what I am trying to get at. The effective clause of that rule is to work through the Rules Committee. What does the rule provide? It provides that when a bill has been in a committee 30 days and the committee has not reported, a rule can be introduced, sent to the Rules Committee, to discharge that legislative committee from further consideration, and bring it up. Then the rule further provides that when a bill has been favorably reported and is on the calendar, not a privileged bill, and it does not come up, a rule can be filed and sent to the Rules Committee, making a special order for the consideration of that bill, favorably reported, and if the Rules Committee does not report it within seven days, a motion to discharge the Rules Committee can be made, and if it is adopted, then the consideration of that bill under the terms of the resolution could then be proceeded with.

Mr. PATMAN. Will the gentleman yield for a question right there?

Mr. CRISP. Very well. I was about to go to the next proposition, which I think fits the gentleman's case.

That "favorable report" was put in there to make it possible to consider a bill that had been favorably reported, and the bill was not privileged and it could not be called up. Now, this is the part of the rule that I believe applies to the case before us, in which the gentleman from Texas and the gentleman from Mississippi and others are interested. The rule provides it shall be in order to file a motion to discharge the Rules Committee from the consideration of the resolution providing a special order of business. If I were operating here, my policy would be to file a rule worded somewhat like this:

Resolved, That the day following the adoption of this resolution there be, and hereby is, created a special order of the House for the consideration of this bill, notwithstanding the adverse report; that there be two hours' debate, after which time it should be read for amendment, and that this special order of the House for the consideration of such bill shall be a continuing order until the bill is disposed of.

That would be sent to the Rules Committee. The Rules Committee does not report it within seven days. A motion to discharge the Rules Committee from consideration of that resolution providing a special order is filed. If 145 Members sign the motion to discharge, on the days designated in the rule, it can be called up, and if the House adopts that special order, then we would proceed to a consideration of that legislation under the terms of that special order.

Now, some argue that the rule would not apply to discharge the Rules Committee in dealing with a bill that has been adversely reported. I have argued, just as I have argued to you just now, that it does apply. Privately I have argued that way with the Parliamentarian and I have expressed those views to the Speaker. Therefore, the action of the Ways and Means Committee in reporting the bill adversely has in no wise taken away any of the privileges, rights, or opportunities of the proponents of the measure to bring it up if they can meet the requirements of the rules; and the rules were not adopted for this particular case but the rules were adopted on the 9th of last December.

Mr. RAGON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. RAGON. There is nothing to prevent the Rules Committee from giving this the same prompt action that it would had the bill been favorably reported, if they introduce their rule.

Mr. CRISP. No. They would have to have a rule or unanimous consent to get it considered because adjusted-service legislation is not privileged and could not come up without unanimous consent.

Mr. PATMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. PATMAN. I presume the gentleman will admit that if we had not had an adverse report made, it would have been possible for consideration to have been given the measure on May 23; but since an adverse report has been made, it will be at least June 13 before consideration can be given to it.

Mr. CRISP. I think that is correct, although I have not checked the date. I do not care to trespass further on the time of the House, but let me say this: I do not blame any of the proponents of the legislation for doing everything they can to get speedy action on it. I do not blame the members of the Ways and Means Committee who are favorable to it for trying to cooperate and bring about speedy consideration, and surely my friends could not expect those who were not favorable to the legislation, who believe the legislation unwise, to cooperate in trying to aid them in bringing up a bill which they thought ought not to be passed. [Applause.]

Mr. TARVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. TARVER. Perhaps my colleague intended to cover this particular phase of the matter, but for fear he might not be so intending I wish to ask him how, in his judgment, under the rules, a petition could be filed to discharge the Rules Committee from the consideration of a resolution fixing a special order of business if the Rules Committee should adversely report the resolution.

Mr. CRISP. That is amply provided for in the rules. I tried to anticipate every possible contingency. The rules provide that upon an adverse report any Member of the House can call it up. Now, gentlemen, that is the history of it.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. UNDERHILL. The Committee on Claims some four years ago reported several bills to the House adversely in order that there might be a record made of the reasons which the committee had for turning down the propositions.

Mr. RAGON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. RAGON. The gentleman will recall we discussed reporting adversely the bill for which there is a petition to discharge now pending. I insisted on it, and the gentleman suggested that if they filed their petition, it would be filed before we had had a moment of hearings on the bill.

Mr. CRISP. The gentleman refers to the beer bill?

Mr. RAGON. Yes.

Mr. CRISP. I will vote to report it adversely.

Mr. RAGON. The situation was that we were in the midst of these other hearings, and we did not have the time to do it until after they had filed their petition.

Mr. CRISP. I had intended to discuss economy. I think the paramount duty of this Congress is to balance the Budget and in balancing it effect $200,000,000 or $300,000,000 worth of economies. [Applause.] When we were considering the tax bill, the Secretary of the Treasury said we could not save more than $125,000,000. The committee, however, insisted that there should be savings amounting to $200,000,000 and the appropriation bills which this House has already passed, plus the economies carried in the economy bill, carry savings of over $200,000,000, and the Senate is still further reducing those bills. I am in sympathy with the Executive or anybody else in his desire to reduce governmental expenditures. [Applause.] We must do it because the welfare of the country demands it.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the gentleman may proceed for one additional minute to answer a question.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Legislation from the Ways and Means Committee is privileged, is it not?

Mr. CRISP. Only certain matters—raising revenue, and so forth. A bill which provides for the expending of money is not privileged. I would say to my friend that two-thirds of the bills which come from the Ways and Means Committee are not privileged.

Mr. RANKIN. Would this bill be privileged in the opinion of the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. CRISP. It would not.

Mr. RANKIN. Then we will have to go through the Rules Committee?

Mr. CRISP. The gentleman is correct.

WAR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill

(H. R. 11897) making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 11897), the War Department appropriation bill, with Mr. LANHAM in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself one-half hour.

Mr. Chairman, we have now come to the discussion of the bill that has been before the House for two days, the War Department appropriation bill. By unanimous consent of the House the remaining time on the bill is limited to three hours, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS], the chairman of the subcommittee in charge of the bill, and one-half by myself. In view of the fact that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS] will discuss the entire bill and I propose to touch only upon certain features of the bill, I have agreed with the gentleman from Mississippi that I shall yield him one-half hour of my time.

I want to discuss a few of the items in this bill that I, as a member of the subcommittee on appropriations for the War Department, am opposed to, and I may say in the beginning that I am not a disgruntled or dissatisfied member of the committee because I am not. The other members of the committee, I think, will bear me out in the statement that, during the six weeks we were considering this bill, the relations between the various members of the subcommittee were most cordial, and an honest, earnest effort was made to bring before the House a bill that the Members of the House could support. There are certain features of the bill that I do not indorse and that I am opposed to because I do not believe they will accomplish economies.

This bill carries appropriations amounting in all to $386,983,452. Of this sum, $281,539,197 and $800,000 of purchase of discharge money are appropriated for military activities, and the sum of $105,444,255 will be appropriated for nonmilitary activities, rivers, and harbors, flood control, Panama Canal, and various nonmilitary activities that are carried on by the War Department.

The bill as it comes before the House of Representatives is $58,789,783 below the appropriations for the present fiscal year, and is $24,380,310 below the Budget estimates.

There are four major items in the bill with which I do not agree and to which I propose to address my remarks at this time. I do not agree with them because I do not believe they bring about the real economy that the Congress is striving to accomplish at this session. I do not agree with them because they strike at the very heart of our national defense, and it is my opinion that where reductions in appropriations cut below the point of efficiency then it is not economy but is extravagance of the very worst kind. These four items are the proposed reduction of 2,000 officers in the commissioned personnel of the Army, the reductions having to do with the Organized Reserves, the reductions having to do with the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, and the elimination of the citizens' military training camps for the fiscal year 1933.

To restore the 2,000 commissioned officers to the bill will cost $3,814,823.

To give the Organized Reserves the same privileges relating to their summer training camps that they now have and have had during the entire existence of that organization will cost $2,109,769.

To restore summer training camps to the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, which the bill proposes to eliminate, will cost $1,080,773.

Mrs. ROGERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARBOUR. I am just coming to that. To restore the citizens' military training camps will cost $2,603,624.

Mrs. ROGERS. And the Reserve Officers' Training Corps?

Mr. BARBOUR. The Reserve Officers' Training Corps, $1,080,773.

Mrs. ROGERS. That will take away their practical training. The training at the summer camps gives the men six weeks' training in actually firing guns. It gives the Reserve Officers' Training Corps the necessary experience in having a battery of guns under their supervision.

Mr. BARBOUR. That amount would restore their practical training.

Mrs. ROGERS. If the amendment adding $1,080,773 goes into the bill?

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes.

This amounts in all to $9,608,989 that we are asking the House to restore to the bill. If we do this, we will still be almost $15,000,000 under the Budget, and we will not have sacrificed any of these very necessary elements of our national defense.

The United States has never been a militaristic nation. In its entire history it has never been militaristic. The military theory of this country has been that we should at all times maintain a small, well-trained, defensive force, and rely upon a citizen soldiery in time of emergency. Our country does not covet the lands of any other nation. It does not covet the treasure of any other nation. We have no idea whatsoever of attacking any other nation. All that the United States has ever asked is that it be left alone to lead its own existence without interference by any other nation, and it has insisted that it should have the right to lead its own existence and that it shall not be interfered with from without.

George Washington laid down the military policy of this country in the early days of the Nation. He said that in our relations with foreign governments we should proceed upon a basis of friendly negotiation and that we should at all times maintain a respectfully defensive attitude.

That has always been the policy of the United States. In depending upon a citizen army we must have a citizen army that is to a certain extent, at least, trained. Without a trained citizen army, with an army that has no training whatever, this country is absolutely helpless. That has been demonstrated throughout the entire history of the country.

In the War of 1812, with an Army largely composed of untrained militiamen, we were never able to gain a secure foothold in Canada, defended by an inferior force of British-trained regulars.

Many military experts believe that the Civil War might never have occurred if the United States had had a well-trained army. That is on the theory that the Confederacy knew that there was no trained Army, and believed they could strike quickly in a military way and the war would be over in a short time. Had the Government maintained a sufficiently well-trained force, some believe the questions which brought on the war would have been settled by negotiations——

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield? Does the gentleman think his argument is carried out by the history of the Alamo and the history of the Battle of San Jacinto?

Mr. BARBOUR. Oh, they had trained men who could shoot the eye out of a squirrel at a hundred yards. They knew what they were about and knew how to do it.

Mr. BLANTON. The American youth all over the United States knows how to handle guns.

Mr. BARBOUR. But he must be trained or he will not know how.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARBOUR. I yield.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I think the gentleman from California is unfortunate and inaccurate in his reference to the War between the States. The South went to war not because they thought they could win, as the gentleman surmised, but in defense of what they conscientiously believed was right—a constitutional right.

Mr. BARBOUR. Oh, absolutely, I do not mean to question the sincerity of purpose of the South, but was merely referring to the military situation which existed at the time.

Mr. BLANTON. When Americans believe they are right, all the obstacles in the world can not stop them.

Mr. BARBOUR. In order to overcome those obstacles, if they are military obstacles, a trained soldiery is sometimes necessary.

Mr. BLANTON. Did not we train an Army of 4,000,000 men and send them across?

Mr. BARBOUR. I can not yield to the gentleman for an argument, because I have not the time.

We had a similar experience at the time of the Spanish-American War. We were thrown into the war with practically untrained troops. Most of you men sitting before me know what occurred during the Spanish-American War, and all of you know what occurred at the time of the World War. We had to call out 4,000,000 of the young men of America, with practically no training whatever, and try to whip them into some kind of shape to send them overseas.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARBOUR. I yield for a question.

Mr. REED of New York. In that connection during the World War, we even had French officers over here helping us train our men in the early stages.

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes; and British officers also. In 1920 this Government adopted its first real national defense policy, which was the national defense act. That act lays down certain lines of activity which since that time the Congress and the country have been endeavoring to follow. This bill absolutely undermines all that we have done up to this time in carrying out the provisions of the national defense act. We have maintained a Regular Army of 118,750 men, with about 6,000 Philippine Scouts. We have maintained for several years past a force of 12,000 commissioned officers, the idea being that in case of emergency we would have the officer personnel ready to step in and train the young men who would be called on to defend their country. It takes a long time to make an officer, but a trained officer can make a pretty good fighting enlisted man in a much shorter time. That has been the theory upon which we have proceeded—to maintain an ample force of trained officers to furnish the training to the young men who would have to be called on in case of an emergency. We have carried on the Organized Reserves. They are a part of the citizen army. They are men who cost this Government little. They are men in civilian occupations who are giving a portion of their time to military training, and they constitute a part of our present military organization.

We have been furnishing military training to the young men in the schools and colleges, and those following through to the advanced courses are furnishing officer material for any army that we may have to raise in this country in case of an emergency. We have been sending young men between the ages of 17 and 23, each year 37,500 of them, to the military training camps to furnish them with some training in the fundamentals of military drill and maneuvers.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Is that our substitute for compulsory military training as European nations have?

Mr. BARBOUR. It is, and it is providing the citizen army that this country relies upon with some degree of training. We have maintained in this country only a skeleton of a Regular Army, and this bill proposes to reduce it to even a more emaciated skeleton than it is at the present time.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman put in the number of Organized Reserves?

Mr. BARBOUR. I shall put that in later. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS] will probably do that, but I can put it in later.

The reduction in the pay item provides for the elimination of 2,000 commissioned officers and amounts to $3,784,414. An amendment will be offered to restore that sum, so that we may maintain the commissioned personnel at its present strength, an average of 12,000 commissioned officers.

If we reduce the commissioned personnel by 2,000 trained officers, it is not going to result in economy, and one thing that puzzles me is why some of these ideas are brought in and Congress asked to pass them as economy measures, when they will actually result in the expenditure of more money. If we retire these 2,000 commissioned officers, we do not get rid of them. They do not go into private life, separated entirely from the Government pay roll, but they go on the retired list at three-quarters of their base pay and longevity pay.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARBOUR. I shall try to yield later. They go on the retired list at three-quarters of their base pay and three-quarters of their longevity pay. Of course that is not as much as they are drawing on the active list, but when you consider that these men are to be retired for age, and on a basis of age only, you are going to get rid of a lot of very efficient and necessary men in the War Department, men who are rendering valuable service to the country, and you will have to hire civilians to do their work. So when you get all through and add the retired pay these men will receive to what it will cost to employ civilians to do a large part of the work, in my opinion there will be no economy whatever. I am of opinion it will cost more than it will if we keep these 2,000 officers in the Regular Army.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARBOUR. For a question.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. It is not intended that this reduction of 2,000 officers shall be permanent hereafter, is it?

Mr. BARBOUR. Oh, yes; the bill provides that. This is not a temporary measure. That is why I say it strikes at the very heart of our national defense.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Of course, if they were ever restored hereafter, we would have 2,000 men on the retired list in addition to what we would then consider a necessary officer force.

Mr. BARBOUR. Absolutely.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARBOUR. I can not yield any more. I must proceed. I am yielding one-half hour of my time to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. BLANTON. I want the gentleman's opinion about this. I want to ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that right now we have by 5,000 more officers in our Military Establishment than the ratio of any other country in existence?

Mr. BARBOUR. I do not care if we have. We do lots of things better in this country, in my opinion, than they do anywhere else. [Applause.] We have an entirely different set-up in this country from that of any other nation.

A large number of our engineer officers are on river and harbor work throughout the country. We have them training the Organized Reserves, the National Guard, the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, and the citizens' military training camps. Those activities are all a part of our organization for national defense, and I do not care how many officers any other nation has, I think we do things better in this country, anyway.

Now, as an economy proposition, as I said a few moments ago, this would not, in my opinion, result in any saving whatsoever to the Government. Then, too, these officers are entitled to fair treatment. They are men who have been in the Army a long time and have given their lives to it, with the promise that they could remain in active service until they were 64 years old and retired.

Many of them are rendering valuable service to the Government. I know, from personal contact, men in the War Department who are rendering service far more valuable to the Government than the salaries which they are receiving. The services of those men will be lost. This is not an economy proposition.

I want to direct attention to some of the effects which will result from the dismissal of 2,000 commissioned officers. I have here a statement that has been submitted to me. Frankly, it was sent to me by the War Department. I believe they are better equipped to picture to us the effect this will have on the military set-up of the country than anyone else. It is short and concise, and I submit it for your consideration.

RESULTING CURTAILMENT OF ARMY ACTIVITIES

In framing the national defense act it was the intention of Congress to embody in law the following essential elements of national defense:

(a) To provide an Army of the United States consisting of three components—the Regular Army, the National Guard, and the Organized Reserves.

(b) To organize this Army into the military units necessary to form the basis for a complete and immediate mobilization of the Nation's man power in a national emergency.

(c) To make provision for the mobilization of the Nation's material resources and the maintenance of war reserves as an element in mobilization.

To carry out the responsibilities imposed by the act, the Regular Army is called upon to furnish officers for all manner of important duties beyond the limits of the Regular Establishment itself. The number of officers now assigned to duty with the civilian components, about 1,650, is considerably below the number demanded. The proposed reduction in the commissioned personnel of the Regular Army, combined with the relief of all retired officers now on active duty as is also contemplated by the bill, will necessarily result in a drastic curtailment of the activities of the Army in administering the forces of the National Guard (187,000), the Organized Reserves (103,000), and the Reserve Officers' Training Corps (127,000). The national defense act originally provided for a corps of approximately 18,000 Regular officers. Appropriations in recent years have limited this number to an average of 12,000. The War Department has reported to Congress that the minimum number of officers required in the Regular Army to enable it reasonably to carry out its mission is 14,063. This number is required to enable reasonable provision to be made for the training of the civilian components, to maintain a small, balanced, mobile force for emergencies, to man in part the seacoast defenses of the continental United States, and to allow reasonably adequate garrisons in the overseas possessions.

Even with the force of 12,000 officers now provided, the calls for assignments to duty with the National Guard, the Organized Reserves, and the Reserve Officers' Training Corps can not be met, while the present shortage of officers with troop units of the Regular Army is a matter of grave concern to the War Department. A reduction of 2,000 officers and the relief of the 134 retired officers now on active duty would force the War Department to curtail many essential activities to an extent that would practically nullify the provisions of the national defense act. A cursory survey of the situation indicates that the following reductions in the numbers of promotion-list officers now assigned to highly important duties would be necessary.

Foreign garrisons	336	20
Duty with the National Guard	229	50
Duty with the Organized Reserves	227	50
Duty with the Reserve Officers' Training Corps	208	50
Instructors at service schools	88	30
Students at special service schools, except flying schools	414	50
Students at general service schools	157	50
Instructors at the U. S. Military Academy	38	20
	1,839

There are, at the present time, no more officers assigned to overseas garrisons than are necessary properly to officer the units assigned to those garrisons. A reduction in the number of officers at these strategic outposts would seriously handicap their powers of resistance. The importance of maintaining these defenses upon an efficient basis is vital in the present state of world affairs. Their reinforcement in an emergency can not be counted upon. Each of them has its own strategic and tactical mission confined to restricted area. No use could be made of these garrisons in the continental missions assigned to the Army.

Now, as to the economy of this proposal, President Hoover in all his recommendations for economy has recommended that our national defense be not further reduced.

I have before me a statement issued to the press by the President on March 25, of this year, in which he says:

We must eliminate this deficit for next year by the further reduction of governmental expenditures and by increases in taxation. The expenditures budgeted for the next fiscal year as sent to the Congress, amounted to about $4,100,000,000, after a reduction by the administration of $365,000,000 under the total for the current year. In considering possible further economies in expenditures we must not forget that of this total about $2,100,000,000 is of such character that it can not be reduced; it is largely an inheritance of the great war through increase of payment on Government obligations and the care of veterans and their families. In addition, our Army and Navy costs about $700,000,000. We should not further reduce the strength of our defense. Thus we must make our further economies mainly out of this balance of $1,300,000,000 remaining from the total of $4,100,000,000 * * *.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. BARBOUR. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. Has the gentleman any reason to believe that the President has changed his mind on this proposition since that statement was issued?

Mr. BARBOUR. Absolutely not. That statement was issued in the latter part of March and a copy of it was furnished to me at my request by the White House this morning. I know of nothing that the President has said since the statement was issued to indicate that he has changed his mind relative to the national defense.

Now, as to the other items in the bill: The Organized Reserves will be denied the pay that they have always received for their two weeks of active training.

The national defense act provides that the Organized Reserve officers, when they go to their summer training camps, shall receive the pay and allowances of their rank and grade in the Regular Army. For instance, a major in the Organized Reserves would receive, for those two weeks, the same pay and allowances that a major in the Regular Army receives, the same for a lieutenant, and the same for a captain.

This bill proposes to permit those men to go to camp during the coming summer without any pay. It provides for the payment of their 4 cents a mile mileage, and then provides $1 a day in lieu of subsistence. They have to furnish and maintain their own uniforms and equipment. Their uniforms they buy themselves. The bill provides that they shall take this two weeks' training without any compensation whatever, after spending many long hours during the preceding winter and the preceding year preparing themselves for it. They must attend camp without any pay.

I say to you, Mr. Chairman, that, in my opinion, it is not fair to those officers. Many of them are men of small means. I know them in my district and you know them in yours. They are young business men and young professional men, with small incomes; some of them are working men; some of them are farmers. They are not men of means. They simply can not afford the time to go to these camps and spend two weeks there practically at their own expense after all the time they have put in, generously, during the past year preparing themselves for the camps. They should not be required to go there at their own expense.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 15 additional minutes.

It is not fair for us to ask them to do it.

I propose to offer an amendment increasing the amount for the Organized Reserves $2,109,769, which will provide for the usual camp pay.

The Organized Reserves to-day have a strength of 108,210, which is exclusive of dual status or National Guard officers who are also members of the reserve and number 12,340. The Budget provided for the active duty training of 20,000 of these Organized Reserve officers at camps. Last year, with a similar provision in the bill, they trained 20,998, or almost a thousand more than were estimated for.

This amendment will simply place the matter right back where it is now, without any change.

As to the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, those units in the schools and colleges, where the young men are giving part of their time to military training, the bill carries $971,289 less than the appropriation for the present year and is $1,080,773 below the Budget recommendation for 1933. I propose to offer an amendment to restore $1,080,773, because the present item in the bill does away with the six weeks' summer training that the advanced students of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps have been receiving each year. After putting in three and four years of their time at the schools and colleges preparing themselves for commissions in the Organized Reserves or preparing themselves to be ready to go to the defense of their country in case of an emergency, this six weeks of training at camp is a rounding-out course, which more properly fits them for the service that they may in the future be called upon to render. Discontinuing the summer camps, I believe, will greatly reduce their efficiency and the value of the training that these young men have received, and the whole effect will be so discouraging that many of them will lose all interest in this work they have so generously carried on.

Mr. SWICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARBOUR. I yield.

Mr. SWICK. Is it not a fact that this is progressive training which these men have from year to year and if they fail to get this training in their fourth year it makes a very great difference to them?

Mr. BARBOUR. The gentleman has described it exactly. After they have worked and trained and studied for three or four years at college they are then sent to these camps, where they train with the Regular Army, where they put into operation the ideas which have been taught them during the course of theoretical training which they have received at the schools and colleges.

Mr. PATTERSON. Will my distinguished and able colleague yield?

Mr. BARBOUR. I yield.

Mr. PATTERSON. I wish the gentleman had the time to go a little farther and tell us what will be the result in the event these citizens' military camps are discontinued.

Mr. BARBOUR. I will say to the gentleman that when the amendment is offered I am hopeful we shall have ample time to discuss it. Then we can go more into the details of the proposition immediately before us.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. In view of the fact that many Democrats are in accord with the gentleman's position, does he think it fair that General MacArthur should write a letter to the Republican leader, Mr. BERTRAND H. SNELL, denouncing the proposition which the gentleman opposes, thereby putting a partisan tinge on this whole discussion with reference to the defense of the Nation?

Mr. BARBOUR. I am quite sure General MacArthur would have been pleased to write a letter to the gentleman from New York if he had thought he would like to have one.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. I am sorry he did not write a letter to the public at large rather than to the Republican leader, thereby having no partisanship connected with the entire discussion.

Mr. BARBOUR. I heartily agree 100 per cent with my good friend from New York that there should be no partisanship in this proposition.

Mr. SCHNEIDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARBOUR. I yield.

Mr. SCHNEIDER. The gentleman spoke about these students from the schools and universities going to the training camps. Can the gentleman tell the committee what percentage of these schools and universities enforce compulsory military training?

Mr. BARBOUR. I will say to the gentleman that is all in the hearings. Offhand I can not tell the gentleman, but there is a table in the hearings which gives all of that information. It gives every school and college at which this training is carried on and shows whether it is compulsory or elective.

Mr. SCHNEIDER. If this training is compulsory, then all of the students would be required to go to those training camps?

Mr. BARBOUR. No. I understand they are not required. My information is that it is entirely voluntary.

Now, just one more word. The citizens' military training camps have been absolutely eliminated from the bill. The citizens' military training camps are those camps which have been maintained throughout the country for several years, to which camps young men between the ages of 17 and 23 go for 30 days' training. I think it has been a fine thing for the young men of this country. I have visited those camps; I have seen the young men there; I have talked with them after they have come out, and they have been enthusiastic about the things they have learned there and the benefits that they have derived. This is the activity of the Army that most directly reaches the civilian population. Many parents have written and expressed themselves as to the benefit which they feel that these camps have been to their young and growing sons. I shall offer an amendment to restore to the bill the sum of $2,603,624 in order to carry on the citizens' military training camps. That, it is estimated, will provide for 37,500 young men at these camps during the fiscal year 1933.

That is about all the time I wish to take. My purpose has been not to enter into a detailed discussion of these things. When the amendments are offered under the 5-minute rule I believe we will then have an opportunity to go more into the details. I simply wanted to give the committee an idea as to what this bill does with respect to some of the activities that have been carried on for the last several years with great success, in my opinion, and with real results, and to let the committee know what is coming when the bill is being read for amendment and what amendments will be offered to restore these activities.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman state what is the entire strength of the enlisted personnel and the entire strength of the active officers now on duty?

Mr. BARBOUR. Of the Regular Army?

Mr. DYER. Yes.

Mr. BARBOUR. We are maintaining an average of 12,000 commissioned officers and an average of 118,750 enlisted men, and in addition to that from 6,000 to 6,500 Philippine Scouts, who are considered a part of the regular force. I might say that this enlisted and officer personnel is scattered all over the United States, and a large part of it is in our overseas garrisons—at Honolulu, at Panama, at Manila, and at other places.

Mr. DYER. The comparison is what I had in mind. It appeared to me that the number of officers is very large for the enlisted strength.

Mr. BARBOUR. I may say to the gentleman from Missouri that it might be considered top-heavy if all these men were on strictly military duty with the enlisted force, but they are not. There are many of the Engineer Corps on river and harbor work throughout the country. They are working in the gentleman's section of the country and he is familiar with the work they are doing there. They are doing work that we would otherwise have to employ civilian engineers to do, and it is work that is right in line with their training and activity as soldiers. Then there is a large number of them with the Reserve Officers' Training Corps at the schools and colleges, and a large number are with the Organized Reserves serving as instructors. Many of them are with the National Guard and a large number are giving their attention to the organization and carrying forward of the citizens' military training camps in the summer time.

Mr. DYER. How many officers are stationed in Porto Rico, for instance?

Mr. BARBOUR. There is a regiment in Porto Rico, and I presume it has its full complement of officers. Just what the number is I can not say.

Mr. DYER. Is there any real necessity for having a regiment in Porto Rico at all?

Mr. BARBOUR. That is a question of military strategy, I presume, that I might not be qualified to answer. We have always maintained a regiment of Porto Ricans——

Mr. DYER. Maintained them; yes.

Mr. BARBOUR. Let me answer the question, if the gentleman please. We maintain in Porto Rico a regiment of Porto Ricans, and, as I understand, it is officered by Americans. It is to preserve order in this Territorial possession of ours and to render any military service it might be called upon to perform there. As to the military or strategic necessity of it or its absolute necessity, I am not military strategist enough to tell the gentleman whether it is absolutely essential that we maintain that regiment or not.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Is it not a fact that under the program as presented, you actually cut out some of the activities that are a definite part of the preparedness measure that we passed 10 or 12 years ago?

Mr. BARBOUR. They will be absolutely cut out.

Mr. SNELL. And we will have to change our entire system of preparedness if we are going to cut out some of these definite activities.

Mr. BARBOUR. We will have to change the whole system and the entire plan; yes.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas makes the point there is not a quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and eight Members present, a quorum.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I yield one-half hour to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS].

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 30 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized for one hour.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, I feel that I should preface an explanation of the reductions proposed in this bill with an exposition of the theory upon which they are predicated. After that I shall explain seriatum the principal reductions which we present for your consideration.

In expressing the theory which very largely dictated the formulation of this measure I wish to be as definite as possible, and hence I have written that part of my remarks and beg your indulgence while I read them.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield to me before he starts his remarks?

Mr. COLLINS. I will.

Mr. McFADDEN. The gentleman speaks of the "theory back of the reductions." Do I understand that this is the gentleman's personal theory or the theory of the War Department or the theory of the committee?

Mr. COLLINS. I should not say they are the reasons of the committee, but rather more my individual reasons.

Mr. Chairman, at the close of the World War certain new weapons overshadowed all others, even in the civilian minds—aircraft, tanks, gas, and machine guns. I include machine guns with new weapons because, although they had been in existence for more than 30 years, their true value and proper use had not been recognized. Hardly were the troops demobilized, however, than the general staffs of most countries, and particularly our own, apparently discarded all that had been learned of these powerful war agencies and hindered rather than aided their development.

In this country military aviation furnishes a good example. It took an act of Congress and the Mitchell case to wrench from the older arms and vested interests sufficient money for the inauguration of our moderate air force. Gas, which produced one-third of the entire war casualties, still gets less than one-half of 1 per cent of the Army appropriation.

The machine-gun development has been slow. Where other nations are making preparations so that they can concentrate perhaps a thousand of these weapons, mounted on 1-man tankettes or single carriers, on a divisional front, we are still limited to mule-drawn weapons tied to the pace of infantry.

Our tank development has been pitiful and so slow that when the principles of the mechanization of armies began to be understood we were totally unable to take advantage of them. I do not mean that this has been the fault of the Ordnance Department, which is charged with the manufacture of tanks in our Army. Our slowness in tank development has come from an inability to recognize their tremendous usefulness and to pull away from less necessary things the money which was required for these modern weapons.

There is, in England, an important reader and writer of military literature, Liddell Hart, who, with two or three far-seeing British Army officers has literally pulled the British Army out of its postwar ruts and compelled it to utilize the war potential which is found in postwar scientific and industrial developments. I shall quote Liddell Hart considerably. In my opinion he is the outstanding civilian authority on mechanization of armies.

In a recent military book there occur these words:

> Every war is different from the one for which the experts prepare. The war the generals always get ready for is the previous war.

In commenting on this statement in a recent article in the London Times Liddell Hart says that he is inclined to believe that it is incorrect; and the war which the War Office prepares for is, unfortunately, not even the last war, but the one before the last. He proves his case by showing that almost all of the disconcerting developments which upset calculations in the World War could easily have been foreshadowed from the Russian-Japanese conflict.

These included the paralyzing effects of machine-gun fire; the hopelessness of frontal attacks; the consequent development of enormous trench systems; and, to conquer these, grenades and high-explosive shell. It did not require a fortune teller to predict the stagnation which finally set in and for which preparation should certainly have been made in order to restore conditions which would permit of generalship.

The World War had hardly ended, however, when there was announced through our military literature the doctrine that trench warfare on a large scale could never exist again; and that wars of maneuver would be the rule, and that our tactical teachings, consequently our development of weapons, would be based on this presumed condition.

The difficulty is to make this doctrine fit the facts. Attempts to prove that it does so are usually founded on a principle which makes insufficient allowance for the increased fire power of the defensive.

If we look back over the last decade it is evident that we are, in general, still using the same drill, the same system of marksmanship and musketry based largely on the rifle, the same ponderous 2½-mile-an-hour divisional organization of infantry troops, and tactical doctrines which ignore facts that we had 10 years ago.

We are the greatest scientific and industrial nation in the world and have applied our science and industry to everything except our military defensive power. One would imagine that it would be almost impossible to prevent our availing ourselves of the astounding scientific discoveries of the past few years, and that by now we should surely have gleaned from the World War facts the important things to our military development; but while the procession is moving along in other countries, we are standing still and seem utterly unable to lift ourselves out of the rut and apply drastically the principles which we should to military science in the United States.

Military reorganization and modern equipment for our forces are greatly needed if our Army is to remain efficient. This is realized by many Army officers, but even some of this class are keeping their eyes still turned to the past war and seem to forget that any reform which takes place must look not merely backward but forward, since the transitions which will follow any future mobilization will be so rapid and radical that we must be fully prepared for them.

The Great War evolved weapons and machines designed to meet very specialized conditions and to answer very definite purposes. While these may never reoccur, we must weigh the facts carefully, choosing and discarding with great judgment. Reorganization, therefore, must depend not merely on the experiences of the last war but with that as a starting point lead clearly to the future, and the vested interests of this branch or that of our military service must not be permitted to stand in the way of progress.

In the generation before the last war the military thought of Europe was fairly well crystallized into a blind faith in the ability of generals to win battles by massed attacks and through this method to push a war to an early and decisive victory. However, because of the severity of modern machine-gun fire, frontal attacks had been abandoned in the school books for more than 40 years.

In the Franco-Prussian War the German victories had been won by wide turning movements, and in the Russian-Japanese War this was invariably the method pursued by the victors. In France and Flanders for the first time in history, when the line of trenches ran continuously from the Alps to the sea, there were no flanks to turn. Ramparts more than 350 miles long, ceaselessly guarded by millions of men and sustained by thousands of cannon, stretched from barrier to barrier.

Confronted with this deadlock, military art remained dumb; commanders and their staffs had no plan except a frontal attack and no weapons to overcome the defensive power, which they should have foreseen. It was useless to squander the lives of endless masses of men; something had to be devised which could overcome the greatly increased power of the defense from automatic and semiautomatic weapons; yet in the World War the usual number of machine guns in the German division was less than 100 and never exceeded 142.

As the war years rolled along, a few leaders realized the causes of the deadlock; and the British military technicians, not having been as successfully deadened by military ritual as their continental companions in arms, finally brought forth the tank as the antidote to machine guns and barbed wire. From the first appearance of the tank until the close of the war, and even until the present time, there has been a continual struggle between those who favored the mechanization of armies and those who by their military conservatism have hampered and opposed every attempt to do away with the masses of slow-moving, slow-shooting, expensive massed troops by the development of proper mechanized forces.

It is necessary to state exactly what is meant by the term "mechanization." Mechanization, according to Capt. Arthur Wilson, of the Field Artillery, is the application of mechanics directly to the combat soldier on the battlefield. Mechanization differs from motorization in that the latter is merely the substitution of motor-propelled vehicles for animal-drawn ones in the supply echelons of all branches of the Army and in the substitution of automotive transport for foot movements.

Mechanization implies the actual use of automotive machines in combat. Aircraft, tanks, and armored cars are the outstanding examples of fighting machines. We have been accustomed to think of this line of development in connection with airplanes, but not as applied to the ground forces of our Army. The purpose of a mechanized force is to provide a powerful, fast-moving weapon, capable of wide maneuverability, which combines fire power, speed, and shock to a much higher degree than now exists in the older arms or in any one combatant arm. It is ideally organized for mobility and surprise. According to Major Brett, in the Coast Artillery Journal for January, 1930, mobility in this connection embraces "fire power, movement, supply, security, mental processes, and all other phases of the battle."

The scheme is simply this: Substitute for the 2½-mile-an-hour infantry masses or the 6 mile-an-hour cavalry lacking fire power, a fast-moving armored force capable of striking suddenly from one direction, disappearing, and then repeating its blows from another.

In considering the mechanization of our Army we must not lose sight of the advice of the British authority, as stated in the London Times of August 25, 1929:

> It is plain that as mechanization develops, the whole army reorganization will have to be considered, since the old-fashioned foot soldier in his trench is helpless against a tank working in cooperation with an air squadron. The army of the future will be a small and highly trained force of experts as compared with the masses required under the Napoleonic system that Germany and the other nations in her wake took over and developed to a ruinous extreme. The traditional British belief in a small army is thus being reaffirmed, very much to the advantage of the cause of peace and economy which the conscript armies of Europe have obstructed too long.

Although written for the British, this quotation has its lesson for our country as well. Our Army is limited, properly and necessarily, by the amount of money authorized for it by Congress. It is then for the military authorities to determine how the sum available to them can best be spent to insure the national defense; but when we see it used on the transient training of schoolboys and drill-ground maneuvers and in the use of single-shot rifles, carried by men on foot who in this age of speed can make but 2½ miles an hour, we are somewhat shaken in our belief in the good judgment of our General Staff. In fact, we see either that this good judgment is lacking or that the power of the vested interests in the branches of our Army is so great that something outside of the War Department is necessary to break the shackles. Obviously, the defense of this country lies in the utilization of science and industry applied to warfare by a comparatively small army of trained experts.

Fortunately, airplanes, tanks, and chemical-warfare agencies fit closely into commercial development.

With regard to this point Liddell Hart has stated:

> If we converted most of our existing regiments into tank or mobile machine-gun units, we should not only need fewer men but the expenditures on machines would have to be met by discharging the large surplus of men in order to apply the cost of their pay to a more practical object. * * * We can fully understand their hardship. * * * But is it right to keep the security of the Nation in jeopardy while soldiers are slowly reconciling themselves to the inevitable? * * *

This is the problem that is facing us in the United States. The problem of the antiquated against the modern army must be considered whether we like it or not.

It is my belief that an army provided with modern equipment and manned by a comparatively small number of experts can eventually be provided from our Army appropriations; and that we have delayed too long in starting on this course. We must not let the training of the masses interfere with the expert construction and utilization of scientific and mechanical means for the defense of the United States.

It was the machine gun which made the trench deadlock in the World War possible.

This deadlock—

Says Hart in his book the Real War—

> was due above all to the invention of an American, Hiram Maxim. His name is more deeply engraved on the real history of the World War than that of any other man. Emperors, statesmen, and generals had the power to make war but not to end it. Having created it they found themselves helpless puppets in the grip of Hiram Maxim, who by his machine gun had paralyzed the power of attack.

All efforts to break through the machine-gun defenses of the western front were in vain until the British developed an invention of another American, Mr. Holt's agricultural tractor, which became the World War tank. Both of these inventions profoundly altered the methods of warfare, but the latter was merely in its infancy when the war was brought to a close. Mechanized forces are merely the extension of the principles of the tank to all other units of our land defense.

Although the first tanks were amateurish in design, their general effectiveness was proved from their first appearance in battle. The highest German commanders have testified that they were a decisive military factor in the tide-turning battles at the end of the war. The Army tanks were slow, and consequently became armored companions to the infantry, a rôle from which it has been difficult to detach them. They proved the first effective antidote to machine guns and barbed wire, the deadly foes of the infantry. Conceived as a device to consist in breaking the stalemate, which had been brought about by trench warfare, their development was neglected as the military minds hoped for the abandonment of this form of battle, and looked forward to wars of maneuver. Groups of tanks operating as free agents, cut loose from the apron strings of the 2½-mile-an-hour foot soldier, are a much more modern conception.

It was not until 1926 that the advocates of a mechanized force in Great Britain succeeded in effecting the necessary separation between the older arms and the armored vehicles. By 1928 the armored cars had been turned over to the cavalry, and by 1929 British officials had determined upon the formation of armored brigades and fast-moving tanks. The description of the types of machines, which were used in the recent 1931 British maneuvers, reveals the extent to which the British Army has become both motorized and mechanized.

A mechanized force, or a mechanized brigade, should be visualized as a separate unit capable of acting without other units in somewhat the same manner as an infantry division. Unlike that division it possesses great mobility. By this increased mobility the art of generalship is given an opportunity.

Visualize the mechanized force as consisting of units of light tanks supported, when desirable, by companies of medium tanks, with artillery support moving on tank mounts; there must be help from the air, both for protection against enemy planes and as assistance for the supporting artillery. There must be smoke units with chemical mortars on fast-moving cross-country vehicles for the use of smoke shell and to blot out the enemy's antitank weapons with smoke screens. Antiaircraft artillery is, of course, essential.

Tanks can seize ground, but they can not hold it. Some form of "mopping-up" personnel supplied with machine guns and semiautomatic weapons on self-propelled cross-country cars must be available both to mop up in rear of the force and to hold gained ground. This form of infantry must also be used for such purposes as the guarding of defiles and bridges, landing fields, and prisoners, for outpost work at night, furnishing working parties, and so on.

There must be engineers for the necessary work of bridging rivers, ditches, and the destruction of man-made tank obstacles. The necessary wireless and radiotelephone service must be provided in special vehicles of the Signal Corps. Command tanks are essential. Without proper communications such a force is comparatively helpless.

Finally, there must be the usual train, repair, and salvage units, water and gasoline units, and medical service.

As I have said, you see we finally arrive at a unit at least as self-sustained as the present infantry division. Our force must have ammunition; it must have gas and smoke; it must have signal communication; it must be able to repair and salvage its own damaged vehicles, feed itself, take care of its wounded, and all of this must be performed on vehicles capable of varying degrees of cross-country ability.

The force, when complete with its trains fully loaded, should be capable of a total mileage of at least 150 miles a day, capable of staying out self-sustained for a considerable period of time and fighting whenever necessary.

It is true that our force can not move among rocky mountains, through forests, and other broken country. Rivers will delay it, but not more than they do other troops; over ordinarily flat or moderately hilly country it can, by picking its way, move day or night. Tank obstacles and antitank mines, plenty of artillery, and antitank weapons will check it; but for that matter it can prevent the movement of the old type of fighting units from any position and immobilize such units. Against a normal formation it can move and act with terrific force.

Imagine an infantry division of our present type on a march through a country in which a hostile mechanized force is known to be; our column is 15 miles long, encumbered with vehicles, moving at 2½ miles an hour with advance, rear, and flank guards out, screened by cavalry in the direction in which the enemy's armored forces are believed to be. The artillery is deployed throughout the column in formation suitable to meet tank attacks. For some hours the commanding general has been getting information from his airplanes of mechanized vehicles moving nearer and nearer to his line of march and at length pushing through places in his protective screen, shooting up units in the main column from time to time and moving off rapidly again. Just as his column is entering some pleasant open country, the enemy's tanks and mechanized artillery are reported to be some 15 miles away. In an hour they may be on him. What can he do?

He can not tell whether the attack will fall on the head or tail of his column, or in the middle of it, nor when the attack may be made. If he halts and further deploys his artillery, he may, and possibly will, find that he is putting it in the wrong place; it can not cover a column 7 or 8 miles long.

What he will do, probably, is to keep moving along, get his headquarters off the road to some place where they can function, notify his artillery to keep on the lookout for proper positions, and offer up a short prayer. Then he gets the report that the attack is coming against the rear brigade and not against the head of his column, as he had expected, and that it is only about 5 miles off. It consists, apparently, of two battalions of tanks employed in three ways, with a swarm of machine-gun tankettes in front and on the flanks of it. His flank guard is coming into action. His batteries of artillery get into position and open fire. His infantry halts, gets their antitank guns into action, and takes advantage of any obstacles which may be handy. Then all sorts of things begin to happen at once. Light tankettes come over and shoot up his divisional headquarters and his artillery as it is going into action; his flank guards are overrun as if they were not there; his guns and antitank machine guns are blotted out with smoke; and his main column is shelled and swept by machine-gun fire.

The first wave of tanks plows through his infantry, the flanks of the penetration are widened by the second wave, and a third wave strikes through his guns. The chemical tanks, laying smoke screens, cover the flanks of the tank companies as they move ahead. It is all over in 30 minutes. A certain number of tanks have been disabled by machine-gun fire, but the attack has not been stopped. The emeny's artillery is still firing, and there is no saying when the tanks may wheel and repeat their attack again.

Our division commander, his tactical teachings of no avail, can not cheer himself by saying, "Well, it was pretty bad, but at least it is over." It is not over. The mechanized force will certainly remain in his vicinity until the full effect of its action has been exploited, even though it does not strike again for some time.

This is a lurid picture, but I have drawn it from a description of a British general who has seen a mechanized force in action. Even if it is only half true, it shows the end of infantry as we know it. Troops can not remain immobilized and accomplish missions. It is necessary to go on with the war.

The ability of mechanized forces to attack flanks, the rear of entrenchments, or any place else that they may wish at quick notice, has added greatly to the confidence placed in this type of unit by the British.

The British mechanized force made its first real appearance in the recent 1931 maneuvers. These involved five exercises designed to show the unit at its best and at its worst. It was so completely successful that all observers agreed that the scrapping of horses, personnel, and obsolete material which had been necessary to create the force, had been many times worth while.

The results have been apparent in British military publications. The new British Field Service Regulations have been considerably changed over the old. The sentence, "Infantry is the arm which in the end wins battles," has been taken out and the infantry is no longer referred to as the "decisive arm." The new manual declares that the "machine gun in the hands of the enemy makes open ground virtually impossible in daylight to attacking infantry, and immobilizes them unless they are supported by an overwhelming artillery concentration." In this connection it will certainly be remembered that during the war it was only by placing artillery hub to hub that as a rule the slightest advance could be made and then at such expense to the victors that a few such were worse than a defeat.

The new manual declares also that the mobility of the armored fighting vehicles—

In formed bodies is at least double that of infantry formations and is likely to increase. Their power of endurance is much greater and they are less vulnerable to air and gas attack.

It then emphasizes their "moral and material effect" on other troops and states, "They can, in fact, render immobile by threat alone" old-style infantry formations.

Liddell Hart says in his book the Remaking of Modern Armies that the effective rôle of the infantry is now limited to "mopping up" the ground that the tanks have conquered and holding it, if possible, for the brief interval before the machine guns can be brought up. But Liddell Hart also points out that with the development of the 6-wheeled carrier "even this transitory rôle disappears, for the machine gun can be rushed forward more quickly than the infantry." I realize that in our Army machine gunners are infantrymen. The machine guns which I visualize as being rushed up, as Captain Hart says, are those carried on 1-man tanks or small cross-country cars, a conception not at all of an infantry nature.

If conditions are as Liddell Hart has pictured them as a result of the British maneuvers and other English studies, the question of the future of infantry as we now know it must be considered. Hart maintains that in certain unusual country, woods, or mountains infantry on foot is still necessary and is still an effective offensive arm when the thickness of the cover gives them a protection they otherwise lack. Such ground, however, is only a fraction of the land surface in theaters where we can expect wars to be fought, and Hart goes on to say that—

It is surely irrational to base the composition and policy of our army as a whole on the peculiar conditions of the northwest frontier of India.

The same argument applies to our Army—that is, if it is for defensive purposes only. In 1927 Hart asked the question, If the machine gun is master of the modern battlefield, in the absence of tanks, and infantry makes so limited a contribution to the military object, why were 136 infantry battalions retained to only 4 tank battalions, 2,176 infantry platoons to only 136 machine-gun platoons? He continues:

Rationally there is no answer, and we stand convicted of spending some 40,000,000 pounds a year on an army the bulk of which gives neither offensive nor defensive value in return. (The Remaking of Modern Armies.)

This criticism certainly applies to our Army when we realize that the bulk of our Army appropriations is for personnel to the almost utter neglect of matériel; that a prewar type of Army is being maintained and the remodeling of our Army along modern lines wholly neglected.

He continually repeats that—

War experience and postwar exercises have established beyond doubt the senile decay of infantry in its traditional form.

By 1929 these criticisms of Liddell Hart were accepted by the military authorities of Great Britain and the reorganization of the infantry took place. Not only were the infantry brigades decreased in size from four to three battalions but gradually the Infantry has been as much motorized as possible. By reducing the proportion of Infantry it was found possible to increase the tank strength, and hence the offensive and defensive power.

The reorganization problem has been discussed by Lieutenant Colonel Beauman in the Army Quarterly for April, 1930 (p. 98). He points out that organization of Infantry has been going on for 20 years. Each change has been bitterly opposed before its inception by the more conservative elements of the Army and has proved by trial to have considerably improved the fighting value of the battalion. The present war-strength personnel of a rifle company is more than is either desirable or necessary in the condition of modern war. In the above-mentioned article the following statements occur:

In the future the use of smoke, of armored fighting vehicles, of low-flying aircraft, and possibly of gas, is likely to become more intense. Each of these factors makes the control of infantry in battle more difficult. We require small, handy companies that can be easily controlled and maneuvered by their commanders. Instead of three companies of 160 men, we could have four companies of 120 men. The latter strength is probably more suitable than the former under the conditions of modern war.

Lieutenant Colonel Beauman states that the actual strength of a company in battle during the latter stages of the World War was seldom much more than a hundred, and such strength proved sufficient for all normal purposes.

The effect of mechanization on cavalry is extremely important. The keynote of cavalry and its essential value have always lain in its mobility, which has made it the best instrument to reconnoiter and to gain information about the enemy and his movements, and to form a protective screen at a distance from the main forces. But modern invention has given us the airplane, which is immensely faster than the cavalry. It possesses a far greater range, both of movement and of observation, and untrammeled by surface obstacles. Aircraft have replaced cavalry as a means of distant reconnaissance, leaving to cavalry the duty of close reconnaissance and acting as a protective screen within a short radius of the main forces, supplemented, however, by armored cars on the roads. Liddell Hart believes that it is possible that even this rôle may be taken over by the light tanks, cross-country cars carrying lightly equipped infantry, or scouts mounted on tractorized motor cycles.

The mobility of cavalry for strategic movements has been important in the past. By this means a commander could transfer part of his strength from one point to another to effect an unexpected concentration of force. But the development of railway and motor transport for troop movements has practically replaced them for this function, except in desert or undeveloped lands. Yet even in this field the cross-country car threatens their position, as was the case in Morocco and the Sahara. Finally, the hitting mobility, which lies in the impetus of attack and the demoralizing effect given by speed of onslaught, has been the rôle of the cavalry as distinct from the early dragoons and their successors, the mounted infantry. The cavalry charge has been the crowning achievement in the battle. But when modern fire made this impossible on the battlefield, armored vehicles took the place of the cavalry. Liddell Hart has stated that in the World War on the western front—

It became one of the tragic jokes of those weary years to see the cavalry massed, in readiness for its long-awaited rôle, behind the point where a grand attack was to be launched, raising hopes never to be fulfilled, for, if even isolated squadrons attempted to pass through, a few odd-machine guns sufficed to bring to a halt their vain advance. (The Remaking of Modern Armies, p. 52.)

If the cavalry played no more essential or important rôle in the last war, when the tank was as yet undeveloped and the machine gun limited in numbers, its excuse for existence in any future struggle is certainly doubtful—and I am aware of the Palestine campaign.

It is the threat of armored attack that has crippled the essential freedom of movement of the infantry and cavalry forces. It is mobility that has beaten them strategically. Small mobile elements have carried out vital tasks or seized the vital points, with the infantry and the cavalry powerless to intervene. Liddell Hart has stated in the Infantry Journal, January, 1929, that—

If horse-given mobility is far better than none, this year's exercises have given little support to the idea that it is equal to mechanized mobility (p. 86).

In this same article on The Army and the Future he emphasized that—

A marching infantryman is as absurd a freak as a man who should set out to walk to Edinburgh on an urgent business errand.

Major Brett in his article on Antitank Defense, in the Infantry Journal for February, 1929, points out that the foot troops should be provided with adequate means of protecting themselves against tanks, and, of course, the obvious means is the protection given by the armor of tanks. Soldiers with nothing to protect them but khaki are virtually asked to commit suicide. Without the protection of the modern means of defense, such neglect results in mass slaughter.

Major Bradley, writing in the August number, 1930, of the Infantry Journal, outlines the criticisms of the present infantry as follows:

The infantry lacks mobility on the march and on the battlefield.

It is too difficult to control on the battlefield.

Success is too costly in man power.

It does not have sufficient reconnaissance agencies.

It is vulnerable to air and tank attacks.

Its organization is not uniform.

All writers on military science agree that the greater mobility would remedy the weaknesses now considered inherent in the infantry and cavalry. Mobility on the march can be increased by lessening the load carried by the foot soldier and by giving him more speed. Speed can be gained only by motorization. Major Bradley urges that if, due to economy, the army can not be motorized that the units should be organized so that they can be transported on commercial vehicles such as trucks, busses, and passenger cars.

Mobility on the battlefield can be increased by increasing the speed of movement and decreasing the size of the units. All weapons heavier than the automatic rifle should be motorized. The speed thus gained by mechanizing the infantry and the cavalry and motorizing practically all equipment would give them more protection. This mode of transportation would permit the gun crews to be materially reduced in size, and the use of armor would supply the greater protection required. Major Bradley states that it appears that the best plan to gain mobility by decreasing the size of units is to decrease the size of our basic units, the squad, and the platoon. Armed with the new service automatic rifle, and I may say, parenthetically, that our ordnance department has developed and tested an excellent one, the major states that experience indicates that a squad of five men so armed will have as great a fire power as the present squad. This reduction in size of the squad and the platoon would make control easier.

Modernization of our wire and wireless means of communication would also aid control. Speed and reliability of transmission of messages and orders can be materially increased by giving the battalion and higher echelons light, cross-country armored cars for this purpose and eliminating the mounted messenger. As I pointed out in the Infantry Journal of January, 1930, in an article on Infantry Tactics by Capt. Charles L. Bolte, the army that adheres to outworn means and methods goes down to inevitable defeat before modern forces with up-to-date scientific methods and equipment.

Major Bradley, in agreement with this conclusion, lays stress on the fact that—

To conserve man power we must, as far as is practicable, replace men with machines. In other words, we must mechanize.

After stating what he conceives to be the necessary mechanized developments, he continues that unless we do mechanize—

We shall soon see the infantry losing more men and money to a mechanized corps to which infantry will be attached for certain operations. Then, indeed, will infantry play a subordinate rôle. Infantry must mechanize or mechanization will swallow the infantry. (Infantry Journal, August, 1930.)

The future of infantry which Major Bradley predicted in August, 1930, is already in sight. The methods of combat use of infantry are surely changing. The same conditions prevail in regard to cavalry. The development of weapons which can deliver a greater volume of accurate fire from a smaller number of sources have permitted and at the same time have forced a greater dispersion of combat elements in the contact zone. We can no longer safely group troops in masses or use them in concentrated formation within the zone of hostile ground fire or wherever there is possibility of attack from the air. Dispersion of troops, which has characterized infantry tactics in the past, tends to become stronger still. The density of men per unit of area in the extreme forward areas and throughout the increased depth of the battle zone, owing to the mechanized warfare and the increased dimensions of the battle zone, is becoming less and less.

Just one word as to motorization. From an excellent article on motorized infantry in Tank Notes of January, 1932, by Lieut. Col. A. L. Bump, a comparison of the cost of infantry motorized and infantry on foot with animal-drawn elements is given. The figures are startling.

Colonel Bump shows, based on the experiences of the Thirty-fourth Infantry during the past more than two years, the initial cost and cost of upkeep for both types of units. Here is the comparison at the end of various years.

For a comparison of costs at end of—

	For animal transport	For motor transport
First year	$95,539.27	$119,975.00
Second year	133,366.12	128,975.00
Third year	172,118.97	137,975.00
Fourth year	210,881.82	146,975.00
Fifth year	249,644.67	155,975.00
Tenth year	443,458.92	200,975.00

It is interesting to note that on the 52 Sundays and 13 holidays of a year (week from Christmas to New Year's included), 65 nonworking days for the animals, they eat up about 10 Chevrolet sedans or 13 Chevrolet touring cars or twelve 1½-ton trucks or four 2-ton G. M. C. trucks; that is, 65 days times $100.37 per day equals $6,524.05. As to strategic mobility, there can, of course, be no comparison.

Unfortunately it is maintained that, granted that mechanization is not only advisable but absolutely necessary, this military need to replace man power by machine power must yield to the need of keeping soldiers in employment. According to a British authority, the practical reply would be that—

Even the dole is but a fraction of what an infantry soldier costs the hard-pressed finances of the country. And all infantry beyond the proportion who can be provided with, and backed by, up-to-date armament are military superfluous. They are, indeed, merely a present charge on and a potential pension increase of the national debt in case of war.

Consequently, if the different arms of the service, particularly the Infantry and the Cavalry, would retain their prestige, they must modernize and look to the future instead of the past. They must develop new weapons and means to meet new weapons and conditions. They must maintain and increase their element of surprise and their mobility. We must develop increasingly the four major weapons which I have pointed out—aircraft, mechanized forces, gas, and machine guns. Unless this is done, we can not hope to have an efficient army, and ladies and gentlemen, unless we curtail expenditures for and on account of personnel in connection with the Military Establishment, I can see no way by which we may ever expect to equip the Army in reasonable measure with these modern, mechanical instruments of war. To undertake to maintain both would make the cost prohibitive.

In this particular bill, practically everything in it is pay, and it has resulted in the Chinesing of our Army. China has two and a half million men in its army; it has no effective fighting machines, and, therefore, it is powerless on the field of battle. Unless we take steps toward arming our soldiers with planes, machine guns, tanks, and smoke screens, our Army will be comparable to that of China. Under our Budget, limited as it is, it would be impossible to provide both unlimited personnel and adequate effective instruments of war except at an expenditure that would bankrupt the Government.

Now, with regard to this particular bill. It is divided into two parts—the military and the nonmilitary. The military part takes care of the Regular Army, including the civil components, and the nonmilitary section includes rivers and harbors, flood control, Panama Canal, Alaska roads and trails, and expenses of national military parks and monuments.

For the several objects comprised by these two titles, or general subdivisions, the Budget recommendation was $301,030,642 for the military title and $110,333,120 for the non-military. The committee has reduced the Budget recommendation for the military division by $19,681,036 and the nonmilitary by $4,888,865.

With reference to the individual branches of the Army, Chemical Warfare was not touched, the Air Corps was not touched, the National Guard was not touched, but in a sense increased, Ordnance was not touched, Seacoast Defenses were not touched, the Medical Corps was not touched, and many other branches of the Army were not touched in the least by this subcommittee, or the full committee, which has approved the action of the subcommittee.

The reduction below current appropriations shown in the Budget, is more imaginary than real. The fact is there scarcely were any Budget reductions, and if the recommendations of the Budget had been accepted without change, the War Department's spending latitude would have been greater next year than this. Let me refer briefly to those Budget reductions. Firstly, there was about $8,000,000 on account of decreased commodity prices; then there was $18,445,990 for housing the Army, and the reason for that seemingly large reduction is because there was no authorization for additional housing of the Army and therefore the Budget could not properly carry funds for such purpose. The principal Budget reduction, at least from a money standpoint, was $5,000,000 on account of the Air Corps. Frankly, had it not been for the rule adopted by the Committee on Appropriations that it would recommend no increases in Budget estimates, I would have voted to increase the Budget estimate for the Air Corps up to the amount of the current appropriation. And then, much to our surprise, we found the Budget proposed to decrease the National Guard by $1,645,577. Now, let me tell you what the effect of that proposal would be. I say this to some of you folks who can not argue a question but can only resort to calling names. You have not said a word about the National Guard. The effect of the Budget proposal would have been to deprive 36,763 National Guard men from going to camp this year, and the National Guard unquestionably is the most important component of our Army. [Applause.]

The committee in its wisdom saw fit to provide for sending the National Guard men to camp rather than the citizens' military training camp boys, because the guardsmen are a thousand times more effective. We have disregarded the Budget estimate for the National Guard, and provide for them to go to camp, and also that they may have 48 drills a year instead of 42, to which they would be limited under the Budget estimate.

These several Budget reductions aggregate around $34,000,000 or $35,000,000. You will note that the only two real decreases pertain to the National Guard and the Air Corps, and they aggregate around six and a half million dollars. The rest of it was because no authorization existed and because of decreased commodity prices. Am I not, therefore, justified in saying that the Budget recommendations in the main are imaginary and not real?

With reference to the Budget cuts affecting the nonmilitary items, there were certain more or less drastic reductions touching the national military parks. The fact is, these parks as provided for will be left in wretched shape. They will be on a bare maintenance basis.

The Budget recommended $3,000,000 less for flood control for the reason that the annual rate of appropriation was exceeded by that amount in the emergency construction act of last year. The committee did not disturb the estimates as to the nonmilitary items I have mentioned. We found a way of saving some money on account of the Panama Canal by taking some of the surplus cash of the Panama Railroad Co. and applying it instead of appropriating money out of the Treasury. The Panama Railroad Co. had about a $14,000,000 reserve in cash and securities. About $6,500,000 was cash. The Budget included four and a half million dollars for continuing work on the Madden Dam, and the committee took three and a half million dollars of the cash on hand of the Panama Railroad Co. and directed its use toward the construction of this project.

The guiding policy of the committee in shaping this bill has been to economize without impairment of efficiency in every possible direction. Not a single branch of the Army is injured by this bill, in my judgment, and every person identified with the Regular Army and the civil components will be available to us to-morrow in the event of emergency to the same extent that he is available to us to-day. Every man that is available to-day will be available to this country in a period of emergency under the terms of this bill.

What is carried in this bill for objects other than pay and perquisites? Let me read them to you: Mechanization, $517,855; seacoast defenses, $1,039,972; ordance, augmentation, $265,366; research and development, $633,550; chemical warfare, exclusive of personal services, $304,017; new airplanes, $11,199,252; making a total of less than $14,000,000 out of an appropriation of approximately $300,000,000. The rest of it is for pay and perquisites, and that is the reason you are hearing so much squawking around here to-day.

Let us take up individually these items. I shall take up first one of the noncontroverted items—subsistence of the Army. There is a reduction of one item there of $2,667,000. The reason for that reduction is this. We found that because of decreased commodity costs in recent years the War Department was able to build up its working capital fund to $7,644,000. They estimate that approximately $5,000,000 is necessary as a working capital and that that amount should be maintained from year to year. The committee decided that the surplus of $2,667,000 should be drafted, and decreased the appropriation by that amount, which is already on hand. That accounts for that item.

The next is the ration, fixed on the basis of 36 cents rather than 37 cents. As you know, the President fixes the ration for the Army—so much meat, so much vegetables, so much of everything. We found that we can buy now more for 36 cents than we could when the ration was fixed at 50 cents back in 1929. If by any chance the cost of foodstuffs should advance, I might remind you that we have this working fund on hand of approximately $5,000,000, which could, if necessary, be drawn upon to increase the ration allowance from 36 cents to such an amount as might be necessary. So the figure 36 cents does not at all control the amount that will be available for rations, because it entirely discounts the $5,000,000 which is on hand.

The remaining item of reduction by the committee under the subsistence head is represented as a "transfer." All items on page 4 of the report, designated as "Transfers," are the result of this: We found that provision for the transportation of officers and men was scattered throughout this bill. It was very difficult to find out how much was spent on transportation of the Army, and in order to give the House and Congress and the American people the complete picture of it, we grouped all items pertaining to the transportation of persons under one head. That is what is meant by "transfers." We did that in this way: We took the total amount exclusive of the civil components and then deducted one-fourth of that amount, and then added the entire amount expended by civilian agencies, like rivers and harbors and flood control, to the amount which was reduced 25 per cent. When we deducted the 25 per cent we did not take off as much as this House approved on the Navy bill. The House approved a one-third reduction on the Navy bill for the travel of officer personnel.

The next uncontroverted item relates to clothing and equipage. We have subtracted $493,472, looking to the larger use of stocks and because of reduced commodity prices. Stocks on hand have somewhat expanded because we have been able to buy cheaper than we have in the past.

The next item is "Regular supplies." We asked the War Department if they could not give us a lower figure than originally estimated for forage by the Bureau of the Budget, and they did, and reduced the estimate by $750,000; so that amount we save.

Next, the Budget recommended 1,000 horses. The committee recommends 500, because we found that considering the private mounts in the Army, which it is perfectly proper for us to consider because we give $150 a year to officers below the grade of major who provide their own mounts, and in addition feed and blanket and shoe and house their horses, and in reality they cost more than a Government-owned horse; so we figured, counting the private mounts plus the number of horses we have, according to the testimony submitted to us, we would be 400 horses over the prescribed allowance at the close of the fiscal year 1933; 900 over before we took off the 500, and with the 500 taken off the excess would be as I have indicated. So this $65,000 is for the feed and care of those 500 horses.

Then there is a reduction of $114,000 because of reduced commodity cost under the head of "Regular supplies."

The next item is Army transportation.

Of the reduction of $5,555,456 proposed under this appropriation, $3,363,840 represents a transfer to the pooled appropriation for travel. Generally speaking, deferments and reduced commodity costs account for another $1,636,253, of which $84,000 is on account of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles, and $984,500 is on account of motor-propelled trucks. The committee has approved $80,000 for the procurement of ambulances and motor cycles and $150,000 for motor-propelled trucks, and has included as section 3 of the bill a provision which will preclude the use of cars on hand, except by the Secretary of War, for other than official purposes, and the exclusive assignment of any except to the Secretary of War and medical officers on out-patient medical service.

The estimates include $85,373 for the development and standardization of trucks and parts of truck chassis produced commercially, with a view to determining the extent of practicable and economical interchangeability, and with a further view of adopting standard types at the beginning of the motor-replacement program which are adapted to quantity production in time of an emergency. The committee has omitted the amount. The plan, in part at least, suggests ultimately putting the Army into purchasing parts and assembling cars. The automotive industry, the committee feels, may be relied upon to cooperate to the extent practicable in working out a scheme of standardization looking to the procurement of complete units from the industry.

The estimates include $543,522 for the rail movement of personal effects, and $567,204 for the packing and crating thereof. Officers are entitled upon permanent change of station to have their personal effects packed, crated, and shipped at public expense. The extent is controlled by prescribed weight allowances, graduated according to rank, and ranging from 4,500 to 14,500 pounds. No small part of such shipments consists of privately owned automobiles. The committee has had brought to its attention by the Comptroller General a number of instances where it would appear that the freight paid on privately owned automobiles exceeded the value of the automobile. The committee has halved the amounts for packing, crating, and shipping personal effects and has included a provision prohibiting the transfer of privately owned automobiles at public expense.

The next item is "Barracks and quarters," where we show a reduction of $1,141,000. The total amount appropriated for barracks and quarters is in excess of $13,500,000. A 10 per cent reduction would have entailed a larger decrease than we have made, and we know that commodity prices have been reduced by about 30 per cent.

"Purchase of land." That is land around West Point, for the benefit of the Military Academy. I do not suppose it is necessary to dwell upon that, because it was clearly shown that the purchase of this land is not necessary at this time. Moreover, we can consider the matter under the 5-minute rule.

"Signal Corps: Transfer of $24,000," and "deferments and reduced commodity costs, $398,000."

Now, I shall take up matters about which there seems to be some controversy, and first the proposal to place 2,000 Army officers in an inactive-duty status.

Mr. Chairman, we have over 12,000 officers in the Army. We appropriated for the present fiscal year under "Pay of the Army," for 12,000, and there are in addition 60 paid out of river and harbor funds and a number of officer professors at West Point; say, all told, about 12,100 Army officers. We have 118,750 enlisted men, aside from the Philippine Scouts. The situation as it confronted us was just this: There came into the Army after the war a large number of men.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I yield to myself one additional hour.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman from Mississippi is recognized for one additional hour.

There was no objection.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, the ages of those men are getting so high that they were keeping the younger men in the Army from reaching positions of responsibility, and that condition will continue until 1950, so that a lieutenant in the Army has very little hope for the future left, because it is certain he is going to remain a lieutenant and certainly will not advance beyond the grade of major before the date of his retirement. Those men, to a very large extent, were all huddled together in the grades of lieutenant to major, inclusive. We have lieutenants 62 years old in our Army. We have captains 61 years old.

This is how it happened: Immediately after the war a great many ex-soldiers, sergeants and corporals, and so on, had a chance to join the Army as commissioned officers. Field clerks, clerks in the departments, had a chance to get into the Army, and they went into the Army. They, in conjunction with many others taken in from civil life, are in a hump, with the result that that hump is destroying the efficiency of the Army. I am not concerned as to whether the Army has 12,000 officers or 10,000 officers. No patriotic citizens can say that we ought to have the 12,000 that we have now, because we all know, and everybody has testified time and again, that many of those officers are overage, and they are preventing, according to their position on the promotion list, the proper flow of promotion for officers junior to them, upon whom we must depend in a future war.

I see my good friend TILSON sitting here, and I want to say to you that I do not have a better friend in this House than the gentleman from Connecticut, and there is no man in this House for whom I have greater respect than the gentleman from Connecticut. [Applause.]

The gentleman told me the other day that he talked to a major general who is now in the United States Army. I shall not tell you the officer's name or where he is stationed, but he asked this major general, "Where can a cut be made in the War Department appropriation bill?" And the general told him to take out 2,000 Army officers.

If you look at the Interdepartmental Pay Board reports—a board made up of Army officers and Navy officers—you will find that they propose reductions in order to make our Army efficient. Do not let our sympathies and the propaganda that is coming to us deter us from doing our plain duty. What are the proper ages for Army officers? West Point graduates should be first lieutenants in 3 years, captains in 10 years, majors in 17 years, lieutenant colonels in 22 years, and colonels in 28 years.

My friends, if an officer in the Navy fails of selection, if he be a captain, which is comparable to a colonel in the Army, he is taken out at about 57; a commander at about 50; and a lieutenant commander at about 43. We are not doing anything in this bill which we are not already doing. Why is it right to do it in the Navy and wrong to do it in the Army? Have we lost our sense of proportion merely because some old general says that what we are doing does not suit him?

These young men in the Army have no chance whatever unless these overage officers are eliminated. General MacArthur, in his promotion scheme, which he submitted to this House, does identically the same thing as is proposed here, except that he carries them as dead weight, while here it is proposed to place them in a retired status. Mind you, an officer is just as much an officer in the United States Army after he is retired as if he were in the Army on the active list, and his services are available to us at any time. I had a colonel tell me not long ago that he did not have enough work to do to make his job respectable. He said he could do it in 10 minutes a day.

Now, then, do you not know that we do not need more than 2,500 officers for the troops we have? A man is lucky if he has an opportunity to serve with troops every six or seven years, and, therefore, every year he is away from them he is going backward rather than forward, and we are permitting the entire mass to become more inefficient day by day.

Now, then, let us do a little figuring. The national defense act, which these gentlemen say they are approving, provides for an enlisted strength of 280,000 men and 15,035 officers. That is one officer for every eighteen and a half men. Those estimates were made and submitted to the Congress after deliberate thought on the part of the department. Using that proportion of officers to our present enlisted strength it would give us a maximum of 6,500 officers, yet we have over 12,000. In the Hawaiian Islands we have 734 officers and 14,000 men. Certainly we have enough officers over there because it is an attractive place in which to live. That is 1 officer to 20 men. If we follow that through we need only about 5,500 officers. In Panama we have 395 officers and 8,630 men, 1 officer to every 22 men. In China we have 51 officers and 901 men, 1 officer to every 18 men. On that basis we find we need 5,900 officers in our Army.

General Pershing in his book figures a division during the World War at 979 officers and 27,082 men. That is about 1 officer to every 30 men. He figures a brigade at 258 officers and 8,200 men. That is 1 to about 35. He figures a company at 6 officers and 250 men. According to these compilations it is necessary to have less than 4,000 officers in our Army, but allowing that we need 50 per cent more back home it would still be less than 6,000 officers.

What is the situation with reference to another country? Our Army has been built up on the same plan as the British Army. I have made a table showing the British Army and our own Army. The British have 550,000 men in their army, in their overseas possessions, including Canada, Australia, and so on. The total of the army of the British Empire is 550,000 men, and how many officers? Twenty-three thousand and twenty-nine, all told. What about our own Army? We have, eliminating the National Board for the Promotion of Rifle Practice, about 550,000 men, too, and how many officers have we?

One hundred and twenty-seven thousand seven hundred and ninety-two. It looks as though everybody in this country has gotten to be an officer, and if it keeps on we are going to reach the day of the milk-white flag, with a company composed of 100 men, 99 officers and 1 private, and all of the officers taking their turn in drilling him.

Now, then, we have something which the British do not have. We have the National Guard, which is one of the most efficient military organizations on this earth. The British have no component in their army that even approaches in effectiveness the National Guard.

The purpose of this amendment is to take out about 2,000 officers from our Army. What did Mr. Good, when he was Secretary of War, say to my good friend on the Republican side, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. SUMMERS], 11 days before his death? He stated when he was Secretary of War that he was going to propose to the President the taking out of the Army of 5,000 officers. He was unable to do this because of his untimely death.

Now, what is the effect of this reduction? It will take out of the Army the overaged officers, so that promotions will flow for the younger men and give them a chance to be promoted. The method we have adopted is to take them out because of age, and the reason we have adopted this method is because we do not know of anything in the world that affects a man's usefulness in the Army so much as senility.

There is not a man that I know of in the Army who wants them taken out in any way except by order of the legislative body, and this method is prescribed because they do not want any politics in it. They say that if we adopted any other method, every Member of Congress and every Member of the Senate, practically, would be down there saying, "Do not touch this man," and many incompetent men, because of political influence, would be retained in the Army.

However, in order to take care of some officers that it is claimed no one else can replace, although I have not very much faith in that theory, we give them a discretion or leeway of 5 per cent, and we provide, in addition, that no Air Corps officer shall be taken out except with the approval of the Chief of the Air Corps.

I have no pride of authorship respecting the language employed for the accomplishment of the reduction. The subject is more or less technical, but my thought is that taking the provision as a whole, it will accomplish what we seek to accomplish in a reasonable, orderly, and fair way. However, if the provision be adopted, I propose to offer four amendments, namely: One, to exempt the Medical Administrative Corps from the 10,000 limitation. Second, to give the President the right to divide the total number of officers in the grade of first and second lieutenants between grades. Third, in making room for the June, 1933, West Point graduates by removing officers most advanced in age in the grades of colonel and lieutenant colonel, to provide for such removal proportionately from such grades, and fourth, to make the exemption of Air Corps officers mandatory.

I have now discussed, perhaps somewhat more at length than I should, the question of the officers. I have discussed the National Guard, and have advised you that the National Guard appropriation meets with the approval of the National Guard Association and likewise the head of the Militia Bureau in the War Department.

With regard to the Organized Reserves, we undertook to accomplish a saving of $2,109,000, and we undertook to do this by providing that these reservists may go to camp this year; their expenses are paid to and from camp, and they are given $1 a day for subsistence at camp. All of their expenses are taken care of, but we do not provide them with pay while at camp. All they have to forego is the pay that heretofore they have received while at camp. These gentlemen are patriotic Americans. They are outstanding citizens in the community in which they reside; and if they are as patriotic as I think they are, they are going to perform their duty in times of stress like these without the necessity of pay.

There are 19,000 of these men who go to camp. As to 1,000 Air Corps officers, we are going to continue to give them everything they have had in the past; and because of the larger purchasing power of the dollar, they will get more than they have been getting in the past.

In addition, there are 772 that go to schools and are instructors and are with tactical units, and so on. Their term of employment is longer than 15 days, and they are taken care of and are amply provided for.

With reference to the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, the provision in that regard is simply this: These boys go to school four years. The first two years are known as the basic course and the last two years as the advanced course. They have four years of military training.

Under the national defense act it has been the policy to send advanced students to camp for 42 days at the close of the school year. We have been sending between 6,000 and 7,000 of them to camp. This bill proposes to take away from them the camp training this year, but provides that they may go into the reserves, as they have done in the past.

Nobody on the committee wanted to take away from these boys their camp training. I do not want to take it away from them. I want them to continue to go to camp, but I felt that in periods of distress we could well afford to let these boys forego their camp training this year, because it is time that this Congress is doing something toward relieving the overburdened taxpayers in some way besides increased taxes. [Applause.]

I had an Army officer suggest to me yesterday in the dining room that he would not have objected to this if we had taken camp training away from everybody. He said there is discrimination—they take it away from some and not away from others.

But I did not want to go that far, and other members of the committee did not want to go that far. So we postponed camp training for only a part of them, and gave the camp training to the rest of them. This is just a temporary matter. Do you not think that everybody ought to make some character of sacrifice in times like these?

Now, I wish to refer to the citizens' military training camps. These are attended by a number of young men each year. I imagine that most of them are real nice boys.

I imagine they have a good time at camp. They learn how to "fours right" and "fours left," "squad right" and "squad left," and they are given a course in citizenship, patriotism, and so on. I know that it is a pleasant vacation for these young men. It may do them some good, doubtless it does much good, but I never thought that the expenditure for it was commensurate with the good that the Government got out of it in a military way.

In other words, I seriously doubt if it ought to be in this bill, but should be carried in some other bill.

Personally I would like to see the Boy Scouts given some sort of a camp training, but I am not going to advocate that now, because I do not believe that any new activity ought to be gone into at this particular time.

With regard to this activity I asked General Bridges—and you will find it in the hearings—if any serious harm would be done the Government if this activity should be suspended for one year, and he said, "No; not for one or two years"; and he is in charge of it.

It seems to me his opinion ought to be worth something. General Summerall in his last report, before he left as Chief of Staff, said that in his judgment that about the only worth-while good that the Government got out of the citizens' military training camps is the opportunity that the camps afforded the Army officers in charge to contact with the civilian population.

There is no disposition on the part of the committee to discontinue this work indefinitely, but we do feel that this year it ought to be suspended. If times get better, I assume we will be asked to provide for its resumption.

Now, let us see about the purpose of this component. This particular activity has been going on about 11 years, and the purpose is, according to the national defense act, to make officers for the Reserve Corps.

During the 11 years we have trained 223,198 of these boys. Only 10,562 have taken the 4-year course—that is, four training camps.

Now, with regard to those who did complete the course and went into the reserve, how many officers did we get?—1,441. And, listen, we would not have gotten the 1,441 had we not stopped giving the boys an examination at the end of the four years, because they could not stand the examination. So we adopted a new method and told the Army officers to pick out the likely boys and say, "Son, you can go into the reserves." If we had not done that, you would not have got the 1,441. During that particular length of time we spent on that activity $24,022,000. That means that every officer that we have gotten out of it has cost the Government, individually, $16,670, and if we add to that the cost of the Army officers and the civilian and enlisted men that we have used in the training of these, it will increase that amount to $27,000 plus per officer. In other words, we can train a boy at West Point or Annapolis for about half of the cost to train one in this activity. In view of that fact, at this particular time, I think we can forego this activity for at least one year.

With reference to the National Board for the Promotion of Rifle Practice, the head of this organization is one of the finest men I know. He is a very fine gentleman. They have rifle matches every year, or have had for the last four or five years. In the beginning they started out with a match every other year, but the last three or four years they have been having matches every year. The Army sends teams and the National Guard sends teams and the Organized Reserves and the Navy and the Marine Corps send teams there. Last year the membership of the civilian team was 461. In other words, the Army and the Navy and the Marine Corps, and so on, made up the rest of them; and counting the pay of officers, and so on, the camp last year cost $1,013,000, in reality to give two weeks training to 461 people who have not previously gotten rifle training at the expense of the Government. I do not think that any great harm will happen to the Government by a discontinuance of this activity. It seems to me that the training to shoot a rifle of 461 persons who have not been getting rifle practice in this day of want and distress is not worth $1,013,000.

That completes what I think are the controverted items in the bill, except that I do want to say this before I conclude. I read in the RECORD this morning a letter from the Chief of Staff, inserted at the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL]. In that letter the Chief of Staff says:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF STAFF,
Washington, D. C., May 9, 1932.

Hon. BERTRAND H. SNELL,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SNELL: In the hearings held by the Military Subcommittee on Appropriations on the Army appropriation bill no indication was given to the representatives of the War Department that a reduction of 2,000 officers was contemplated, and in consequence no opportunity has been afforded to express the opinion of the department on such a revolutionary step. As the military adviser of the Government, I am therefore taking the liberty of presenting to you the views of the General Staff on this important matter, with the hope that you will lay them before the House.

I think the Chief of Staff is a very estimable gentleman, and I have nothing but the kindliest feelings for my friend Mr. SNELL, but it seems to me, as a matter of strict propriety, that that letter should have been sent either to the Speaker of the House, the majority floor leader, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, or the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs. And then I am wondering again why the Secretary of War did not send the letter instead of the Chief of Staff. The Secretary of War is the head of the War Department, and it seems to me that if he is opposing the economies that this committee is trying to bring about, he ought to have sent this message up here himself.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLINS. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Perhaps I am to blame for that, because I indicated that I would like to have his views, and he sent the letter to me.

Mr. BYRNS. The gentleman has just said that the Secretary of War is the head of the department. Does the gentleman believe that the Chief of Staff would ever think of sending a letter of that importance and significance without first conferring with the Secretary of War?

Mr. COLLINS. I doubt that very much. With regard to that particular statement, on December 28, 1931, I wrote the Secretary of War and asked him how much ought to be reduced from this bill in money if 2,000 Army officers were to be taken off. That was in December. I received his answer on January 14, 1932. The Secretary of War in this letter gave the committee the information it wanted, as to the amount to be deducted in the event 2,000 officers were taken away from the officer personnel of the Army. If these 2,000 Army officers are taken off the saving will be approximately $4,000,000, but that does not begin to state the case, because already there is in the formative stage a proposal to begin a new housing program costing over $97,000,000 to house, among others, a portion of these 2,000 Army offieers. The average saving on account of these 2,000 officers ultimately will be approximately $25,000,000 a year.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield before he leaves that point?

Mr. COLLINS. I am sorry, but I can not yield.

Mr. WOODRUFF. I wish you would, because it will clear up in my mind an apprehension as to what the cost of that particular activity will be. I think the gentleman misspoke himself. He made the statement that there would be a saving of $25,000,000 because of the additional cost of housing.

Mr. COLLINS. Not only housing, but an officer is paid in quite a number of ways. He gets his base pay and then his 5 per cent increase every three years, and in addition to that he gets commutation of rations and commutation of quarters, and so on.

In addition to that, he gets his transportation charges and many other charges, which make the cost of an Army officer over $10,000 to the Government.

Now, further, with reference to General MacArthur's letter, let us consider his testimony and see if he was not advised when he testified. He testified on December 21, 1931. I read from the hearings:

Mr. COLLINS. Should we not have, instead of our present conditions, a nucleus of real, live, vigorous, active officers, trained, commensurate with age and rank, for war-time missions in the field?

General MACARTHUR. That is the ideal condition.

Then later on:

The captain of a company has to go through physical exertions which the age of 63 makes it difficult for him to undertake. He should be in a higher rank at that age and not subject to such effort.

Mr. COLLINS. General, I can not believe that you are advocating as ideal a situation where a first lieutenant is 60 years of age and a captain is 63 years of age, and a major 61 years old. I can not believe that you advocate that as an ideal war condition.

General MACARTHUR. No, sir; I do not.

Then further on:

The average age of the Army in its various grades is much higher than I would have it.

Further, General MacArthur says:

My so-called promotion bill that you probably know about in a general way, is designed to reduce ages as far as possible.

Mr. COLLINS. I had understood that reduction in age was what you were trying to accomplish; that the idea you had in mind was reduction in age of the officer personnel of the Army.

General MACARTHUR. The object of the bill I suggested is to make the flow of promotion more rapid or to place officers in command rank at younger ages.

But at the same time I would not say * * * that those men did not represent a certain degree of merit.

Mr. COLLINS. Your promotion bill does, however, contemplate the carrying of these men on until age takes them out, does it not?

General MACARTHUR. Yes, sir.

And the entire question was brought to his attention at that time, and he gave us the information that we requested.

In addition to that, after this letter was written to Secretary Hurley, Mr. Hurley came before the committee to testify, and he said this:

Mr. Chairman, I, of course, have kept in touch with your hearings as they proceeded, and I am familiar with the bill and the hearings at the present time.

I have read the statement made to you by Chief of Staff, and I think it would be rather a waste of time for me to go over the same ground again unless you gentlemen have some questions you would like to ask me.

Now, it seems to me that all of the advance information that was necessary was afforded these gentlemen, and, aside from that, Congress has been hearing this question discussed ever since I have been on the floor of this House, and that is nearly 12 years. We have had hearing after hearing upon the subject.

There is no man in this House who does not know of the hump that is in the Army. We know the recommendations of the Interdepartmental Pay Board. We know of the hearing held by a committee of the House and by a committee of the Senate on the promotion of Army officers. Nearly all of us know it in more than a general way, and it seems to me, with the information before us, we could at least frame an appropriation bill without the aid of the Chief of Staff of the Army. It is a question of policy, anyway.

Mr. Chairman, the committee feels that the Military Establishment should bear its share in governmental economies, yet sheer economy was not the dominating factor in the drawing up of the bill under discussion. In spite of the vital need for economy, the committee, after a great deal of painstaking effort, has, by keeping efficiency in the foreground, brought forth a bill that combines both economy and efficiency. The reductions submitted to you will impair very slightly our military effectiveness for war. Reductions average less than 10 per cent when it is considered that commodity prices have been generally reduced from 30 to 75 per cent.

We believe that the country demands that governmental appropriations be reduced and that the Army should accept its share of the general reductions without protest and in the spirit of patriotism. Other individuals not on the pay roll of the United States are taking enormous losses, others have had their pay and incomes greatly reduced, while still others are entirely without work and are living on the barest necessities. A large part of our population are living on charity. Hunger is everywhere.

In April, 1930, when the census was taken, there were reported 48,832,589 gainful workers in the United States. Of this number, 3,187,649 were out of employment, as shown by the census. Since then the Labor Department, the Interstate Commerce Commission, and other Government agencies have been furnishing monthly reports of the percentage of jobs lost in various grades of employment that largely compose the better-organized groups of workers. The number of the better-organized groups of workers aggregate 26,643,323, or 54.6 per cent of the 48,832,587 gainful workers, as reported by the last census. Of these 26,643,323, the number of 6,502,794 have lost their jobs since April, 1930. This number added to the number out of employment in April, 1930, makes a total of 9,690,441 unemployed. In addition it should be recalled that we have no figures of the 45.4 per cent of unorganized workers. If unemployment of this group were known we would find that from twelve to fourteen million workers in the United States are now out of employment.

The minimum figure—and it is just as accurate as if we were taking a census—is 9,690,000 unemployed.

Now, then, with such a condition as that confronting us, with this terrible unemployment situation existing throughout the country, with hungry people walking the streets of the cities and towns of this country, do you not think it is time the War Department should take a reasonable cut without complaint, especially when no effective instrument of the Regular Establishment is touched and they are affected only temporarily in the other branches?

Under such conditions as these it would, indeed, be a violation of the trust imposed in us and a great disappointment to the thousands of the great rank and file of our citizens if we fail to let this bill substantially share in the reduction of governmental costs. That the Government has been extremely generous to its workers, civil and military, can not be denied, yet opposition to any reduction in pay and perquisites comes from many classes when it is well known that reductions in governmental costs must be made if our country is to survive.

We are not the only country that has found it necessary to curtail the lavish expenditure of the taxpayers' money. The British have found reductions absolutely necessary in every branch of government, and the recent British budget provided for the army, navy, and air force an appropriation of $364,753,228. The British Army budget is but $127,525,560.

The bill before us is not a partisan one, although an attempt to make it one seems imminent. The urgent demand for economy and the existence of numerous groups lobbying to prevent any move in this direction is well known to both Democratic and Republican Members of this House. That President Hoover agrees with the desire of the committee to bring about savings is evident from his message of May 5. An effort has been made here to-day to show that he does not believe in the reductions and economies brought forth by this committee, but I doubt that. Certainly it can not be true if his statement of the 5th of this month is true. In his message of May 5 he stated—a drastic program of economy which, including the savings already made in the executive Budget of $369,000,000, can be increased to exceed $700,000,000 per annum.

He further stated that the economy program—must embrace the rejection of all measures that increase expenditures unless they be for undoubted emergency.

That he understood the difficulties in the way of economies is evidenced by the following:

The Government can not be dictated to by organized minorities. Such action will undermine all popular government. I know that these actions do not reflect the will of the country, and I refuse to believe that the country is unable to reflect its will in legislation.

Mr. Chairman, I have confidence in the membership of this body. The entire country is looking our way. We are expected to bring some measure of relief to a suffering people. Surely in times like these we should unitedly labor for a balanced Budget not alone through increased taxes but through reduced appropriations as well. It is grossly unfair to loyal taxpaying citizens to expect them to make all the sacrifices while governmental expenses run smoothly on. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS].

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I have asked for this time not to refer to this bill but to refer to some statements that have been made recently with reference to the necessity of reductions to be made by the Congress in order to balance the Budget. Taking into consideration the recommendations of the Secretary of the Treasury in regard to necessary revenue for the next year, it has been said repeatedly that $231,000,000 must be saved by way of reductions in expenditures in order that the Budget may be balanced. In most of the statements there has been no reference to the fact that the House of Representatives has already saved very nearly that amount in the way of reductions in estimates submitted by the President. There seemingly has been a purpose to ignore what the House of Representatives has done, or those who have made these statements are ignorant of just what reductions have been made.

I am simply taking advantage of this opportunity to repeat what I have said several times. As I said the other day, the House of Representatives has made a reduction at this session in the President's Budget estimates of $161,455,101.56. Of that amount, the sum of $14,071,120 represents reductions made in the first deficiency bill, which, therefore, can not be applied to the reductions for the year 1933. But it remains that if the House of Representatives shall concur with the Committee on Appropriations with reference to the reductions made in the pending bill, these bills will have left the House with a total reduction of $147,283,881.56. Add to that the $5,000,000 by which the Senate reduced the Interior Department appropriation bill, and you have $152,283,861.56. If you will add to that the reductions made by the Senate in the bill which carries appropriations for four of the departments, amounting, as I recall, to about $12,400,000, and also add to it the sum of $42,000,000 which it is stated was saved by the passage of the economy bill the other day, you have a total of $206,683,888.56, leaving in order to meet the requirements for the purpose of balancing the Budget, as we are told through the newspapers, about $24,000,000 or $25,000,000.

I call your attention to the fact that there are pending in the Senate the agricultural appropriation bill, the Treasury and Post Office appropriation bill, the Navy appropriation bill, the legislative appropriation bill, the District of Columbia appropriation bill, the independent offices appropriation bill, and there will follow the War Department appropriation bill. Certainly out of that great list of bills there will be many more millions of dollars saved and very much exceeding the $231,000,000 which it is said is essential in order to balance the Budget. I state this not to indicate that Congress ought to stop saving, but to show that Congress is making effective progress in the matter of reductions, and is certainly entitled to more credit than it is receiving. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following sums are appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes, namely:

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I am not in favor of the economy program on the Army bill. I believe the Appropriations Committee has usurped the functions of the Military Affairs Committee of the House. I do not believe that by the power of the purse we should change our policy of national defense. I believe this policy should be established by a report from the Committee on Military Affairs and by a vote of the House and the Senate and the signature of the President.

If we are to establish the policy of this Nation in regard to national defense through the medium of the purse, then we can establish the policy of the Federal Reserve Board through the medium of appropriations.

These things are essential to the security of the Nation. The Government is in the red, but I would rather see the Government in the red than to see the country unprotected and to find that the red blood of the boys of this Nation will be shed on battlefields because we are unprepared. I do not think we would have considered it great economy if General Pershing had wired back to the United States, "I saved $200,000,000 worth of ammunition and only lost 500,000 men." I do not believe the people of this country want to see our Nation stripped naked in the presence of those who might be our enemies in order that we may balance the Budget. If we can not balance the power of the Nation to defend itself, what is the use of balancing any budget?

I am opposed to the proposition that the youth of this country shall go into the next war—and God forbid that we shall have one; but there are clouds on the horizon of almost every nation in the world—without an opportunity to know the art and science of warfare and the intricate and technical conditions under which war is fought to-day.

The few millions we save under this bill will cost us billions if there be even the threat of war. The mad rush to train men in that exciting moment will drain the budget of every family in the land. In the last war troops were marched into the battle line who had had only a few weeks in camp under officers trained in the rush and hurry of war hysterics. Will we not take warning from the lessons of the past? Will we save in money now and pay in blood later?

I believe the officers' training camps are the soul of our national-defense policy. I believe that the officers in the Reserve Corps are as valuable to us to-day as the officers in the Medical Corps. You can not train doctors just by calling them to the colors any more than you can train officers by sounding the tocsin of war.

They are the teachers of the art of war. We may as well close up our colleges in the name of economy and pay in ignorance as to fling out these great trainers and war scholars. Ignorance of the arts of peace destroys commerce and liberty. Ignorance of the art of war challenges disaster to the sovereignty of a nation and is sure to bring humiliation and misery to its people.

I do not believe in a policy of economy which imperils our Nation. I believe the peril to the country that the terms of this bill will cause will be resented by the taxpayers. Taxpayers are citizens, and citizens might have to become soldiers. Yes; millions are out of work. I sympathize with them. I hope they will be employed soon. In the event of war millions might be flung into their graves without necessity. Sympathy will do them no good. Jobs will do them no good. To forestall that I vote to uphold our defense policy.

I, therefore, sir, shall support in minor details the recommendations of the committee, but I shall oppose the change in national policy by mere manipulation of the purse. When this Nation wants to establish its policy it must do it in the open and not through the medium of cutting appropriations.

We are not going to cripple our Government against the day it faces an enemy. Knowing full well that this is not a partisan issue and that no one party has a monopoly on love of country or a monopoly on a desire for the country to be properly prepared, I for one on the Democratic side shall oppose this committee which, through the power of the purse, is attempting to strangle proper defense of our Nation as outlined in the present law of the land. [Applause.]

Mr. HOLADAY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, the House is commencing the consideration of the last appropriation bill. The country within the last few days has heard a special message from the President calling upon Congress for nonpartisan cooperation in order that economies in government may be effected.

Last week we considered an economy bill, and we watched, day after day, while the economies, estimated at $210,000,000, were by the action of this House whittled down to $42,000,000. Here is an appropriation bill that has been brought in, prepared by a subcommittee and reported by the entire committee, that has attempted to effect economies in government, and before the first section has been read, I was sorry to hear the minority member of the subcommittee rise on this floor and announce that he proposed to introduce four amendments that would increase the bill by approximately $9,500,000.

Let me appeal to you that we keep in mind the financial condition of this country. Let me appeal to you that we keep in mind the message of the President, which met with the approval of this country.

National defense has not been injured by this bill. Are we to witness again this week the same chiseling process that robbed the economy bill and cut it from $210,000,000 to $42,000,000?

I am sorry to see these amendments come from the minority side of this House immediately following the appeal of our President for nonpartisan cooperation in reducing the expenditures of our Government.

I hope the House will proceed with the consideration of this bill with a realization of its responsibility to the country and with a realization of the financial situation that now faces the Government.

Mr. BARBOUR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLADAY. I yield.

Mr. BARBOUR. Has the gentleman read the statement issued by the President to the press on March 25 in regard to economy, wherein he says, "We should not further reduce the strength of our defense"?

Mr. HOLADAY. Let me ask the gentleman whether in offering these four amendments he is doing it at the request of the President of the United States?

Mr. BARBOUR. I am not reducing the national defense beyond what it is now, and that is what the President recommends.

Mr. HOLADAY. Am I to understand, then, that the gentleman in offering these amendments to increase the amount of the bill $9,500,000 is representing the wishes of the President?

Mr. BARBOUR. No; of course not. I am simply citing the statement of the President in connection with our national defense, and I say that by reducing the appropriations $9,500,000 we are doing the very thing the President says we should not do.

Mr. HOLADAY. Then I take it the gentleman assumes he is representing the wishes of the President?

Mr. BARBOUR. No; I do not assume to speak for the President.

Mr. HOLADAY. I simply wanted the attitude of the gentleman made plain, so that the House and the country may know what we are doing.

Mr. BARBOUR. So far as the President is concerned, he can speak for himself, and he has spoken. So far as my amendments are concerned, I assume full responsibility for them.

Mr. HOLADAY. Do the gentleman's amendments coincide with the statement of the President?

Mr. BARBOUR. The President has said that we must not further reduce the national defense, and my amendments are to prevent any further reduction in the national defense.

Mr. BYRNS. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield to me?

Mr. HOLADAY. I yield.

Mr. BYRNS. I understood the gentleman from California, in response to an inquiry by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] in his speech a while ago on the same subject, to reply that he had an interview with the President; and although he did not say so, he left those of us here under the distinct impression that he was representing the views of the President.

Mr. BARBOUR. Oh, no; that is a violent assumption, I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee. The record will not show anything of that kind.

Mr. BYRNS. I do not know what the record will show, but that was the impression that we got. If I misunderstood the gentleman, I am glad to have him correct me.

Mr. BARBOUR. The gentleman did not hear me say that. I read a statement made by the President of the United States on March 28, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] asked me if I knew whether the President had changed his attitude in regard to that matter. I said that the statement was made by the President that we must not reduce our national defense, and that I had called up the White House and asked one of the secretaries to send me that statement, and it was sent.

Mr. BYRNS. We heard the gentleman from Mississippi state that this bill does not carry the slightest reduction in appropriations for the National Guard; it does not carry the slightest reduction in appropriations for chemical warfare; it does not carry the slightest reduction for the Air Corps or the enlisted personnel of the Army. The only reduction it carries, so far as the fighting force is concerned, is with reference to 2,000 officers, and we have more than 12,000 officers now, and as those are retired they will be subject to call if needed. Now, does the gentleman think that these reductions in this bill is going to affect our national defense?

Mr. BARBOUR. According to my understanding we now have many officers not engaged in active military duties. We have men in the Engineer Corps working on the Mississippi River and on the Great Lakes. We have them training students in schools and agricultural colleges, and the Organized Reserves and National Guard and the Reserve Officers' Training Corps.

Mr. HOLADAY. Mr. Chairman, I can not yield further. I want to make this one statement: The gentleman from California is entitled to offer any amendments he wants to. This House and this country are entitled to know whether or not these amendments represent his personal view or the view of the subcommittee or somebody else. Gentlemen, let me appeal to you again, we must face the country on this question of economy, and we must not fail as the House failed on the economy bill last week.

Mr. BEEDY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last four words. I welcome the opportunity which is now presented to some of us who do not agree with all of the items in the pending bill, to make perfectly clear to the Members of the House and to the country precisely what our position is. Let it be understood once and for all that there is no disagreement among any of us as to the necessity for economy. What is economy? The dictionary says that economy is a careful, thrifty method of management, without loss and without waste. So that economy is a relative term. There is no one here at the outset who wishes this country to waste one penny in this pending bill, or in any other bill. The President and the Director of the Budget went all over the needs of the Army for the fiscal year of 1933 and they reduced the Budget recommendations from $451,000,000 in round numbers in 1932 to $411,000,000 for 1933. It is fair to say that $20,000,000 of that reduction was possible because projects for enlarged facilities in the Army were considered possible of postponement in the present exigency. A part of the remaining $21,000,000 reduction was made possible through the decrease in commodity prices. In addition to this Budget cut, which the Army was glad to take, in view of present necessities, this bill proceeds to cut still farther. After the War Department has taken the Budget cuts by reason of decreased commodity prices, this bill would enforce a further cut, on the same ground, of approximately $3,366,000. We say that the committee is crowding on this item in the pending bill. We think before the debate is over that we will be able to prove it.

Now, I want to get into the mind of the Members of the House, so that none of us can be accused of being militaristic, the picture presented before you on the chart, which I have exhibited here. We are a great Nation. We have a great measure of national wealth, and a great many people. The Army is a protection to both life and property in time of peace and in time of war. In these days God knows we can not afford to cripple this great protective agency, for nobody knows what danger may beset us at any moment. Some of us think that economy, careful management, demands that we go about so far in cutting this bill, and no farther.

I do not think any explanation of what the President meant when he said that we can not afford to go any farther in cutting the national defense is necessary. He meant just what he said, and he said it only this spring.

Look at these tables pictured before you on this chart representing the size of the United States reserve and of the United States Regular Army, which we maintain in proportion to our national wealth. (See charts on pp. 9942 and 9943.) The upper section above the solid black mark is the reserve army. The solid black mark represents our Regular Army. Take Italy. She has the biggest reserve army on the basis of national wealth. Then look at France, Russia, Japan, and also at the United Kingdom and Germany, and last at this tiny mark here, less than a quarter of an inch in width. It represents the total reserve and Regular Army of the United States. Such is the size of the Army which we are maintaining to protect our people and our property in any emergency. It is this Army which the gentleman from Mississippi would have us cut in the pending bill. For our present skeleton of an army we are spending less according to our wealth, infinitely less, than any nation in the world.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEEDY. No. I can not do it in the time at my command. I will be glad to yield if the gentleman can get me more time.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Oh, I think the gentleman will be able to get more time.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended an additional five minutes at the conclusion of the present time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BEEDY. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. ALLGOOD. What is the pay received by the Army and the officers in the United States as compared with the pay received in these other countries?

Mr. BEEDY. Oh, we pay our soldiers, I am happy to say, much more than Italy or China or Russia pays hers. I am now pointing out the size of our Army. The gentleman will note there are no dollar and cent signs on this chart. I am showing you the size of the Army as compared with the size of the armies in other nations of the world based on national wealth.

Mr. ALLGOOD. But that must be a very expensive proposition after all.

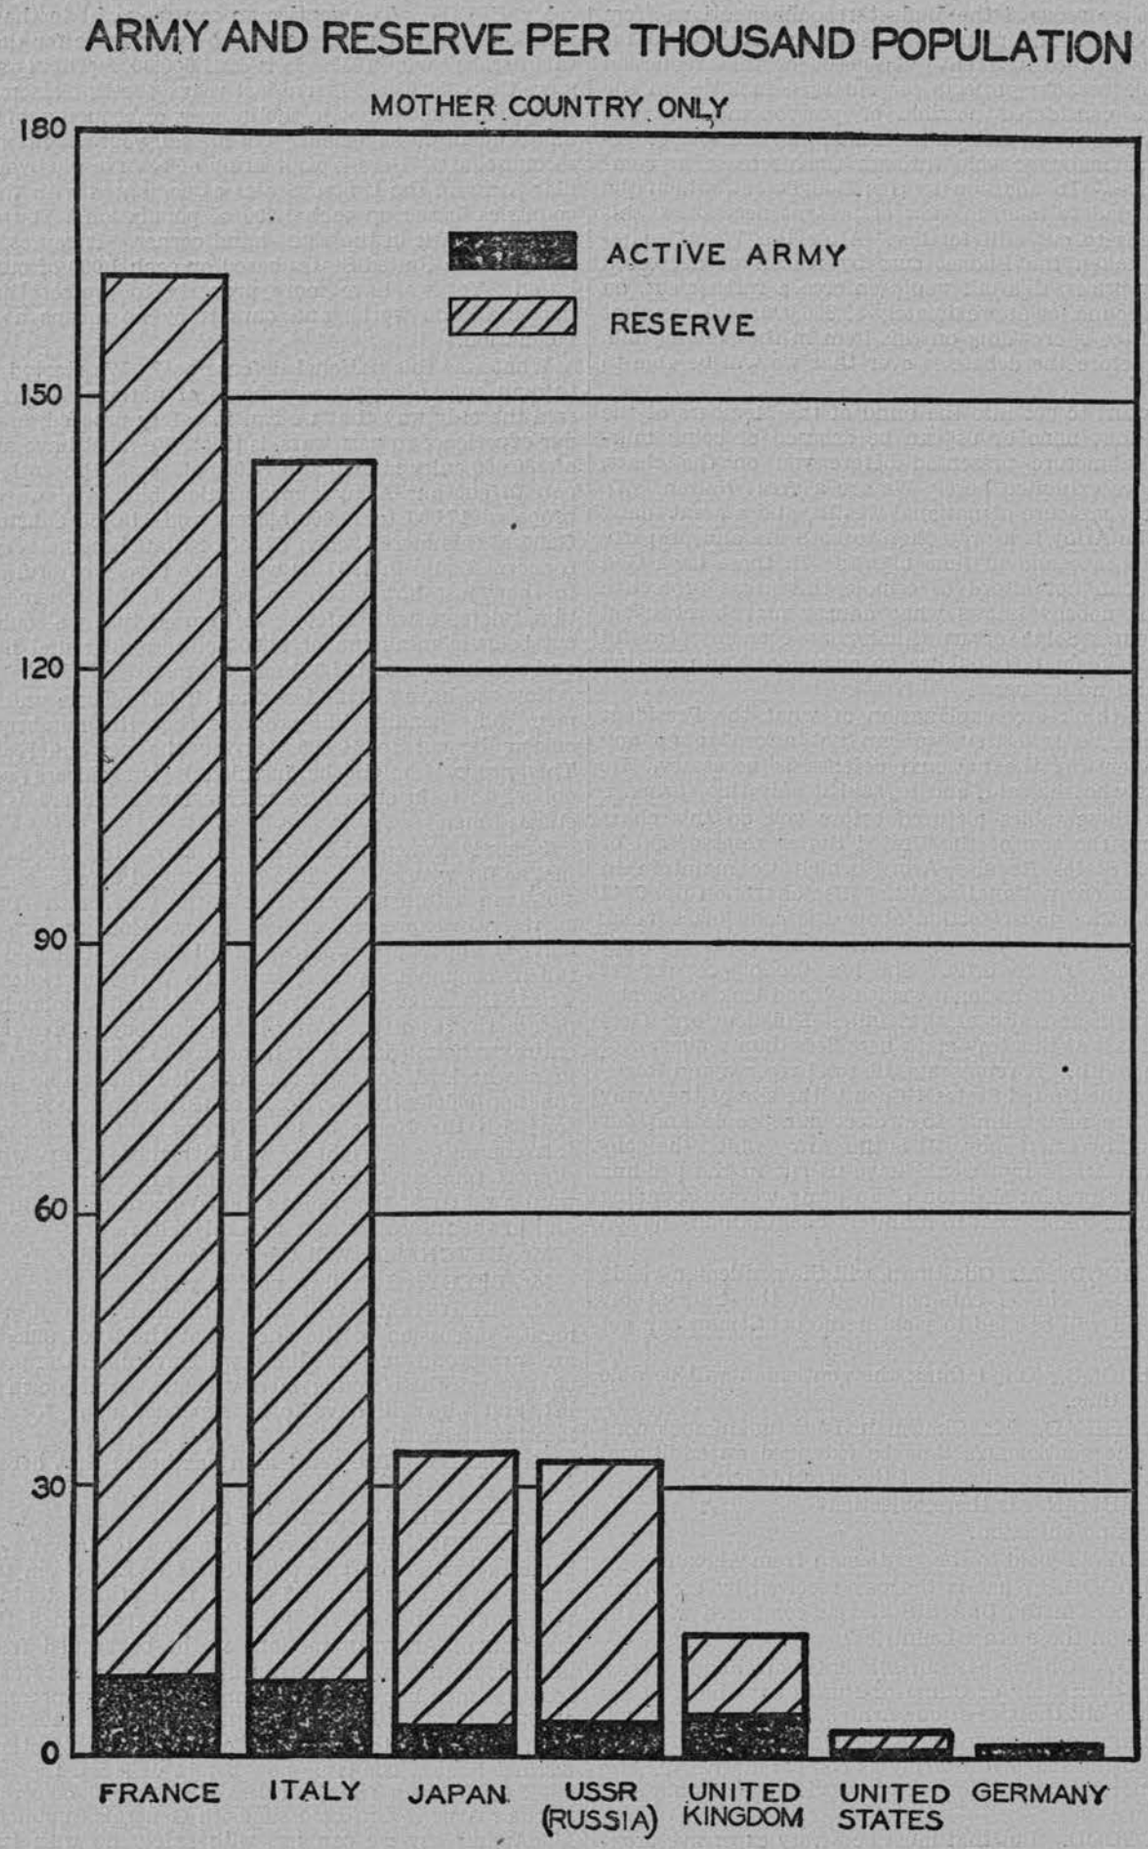
Mr. BEEDY. The gentleman can see right in the appropriation bill what we are asked to appropriate for the Army this fiscal year of 1933. It is $281,000,000. This is a cut of more than $53,000,000 from last year. We think, some of us, that such a cut is not in the interest of economy, of careful and prudent management. Let me call your attention to this second chart. Here is your army of reserve plus your Regular Army in the United States as compared with the other countries, based on each 1,000 of population. You can see this tiny mark in the right-hand corner. It represents the Army of the United States based on each 1,000 of our population. Yet we have more property to protect than any nation in the world, and ours is by no means a meager population.

What was this national defense act? We started in 1920 to map out an organized scheme of national defense. We said the only way that we can in safety proceed, in view of our experience in past wars, is this: We must have an Army of 280,000 enlisted men and 17,000 officers. Presently we began to cut our Army appropriation bills, and we cut the proposed 17,000 to 12,000 officers and 118,750 enlisted men. General Summerall when Chief of Staff became very much concerned, and in 1927 he went into a very careful analysis to show just how much we could cut this scheme of national defense with safety. He figured that we could never cut below a minimum of 14,000 officers, in round numbers, and a minimum of 165,000 enlisted men.

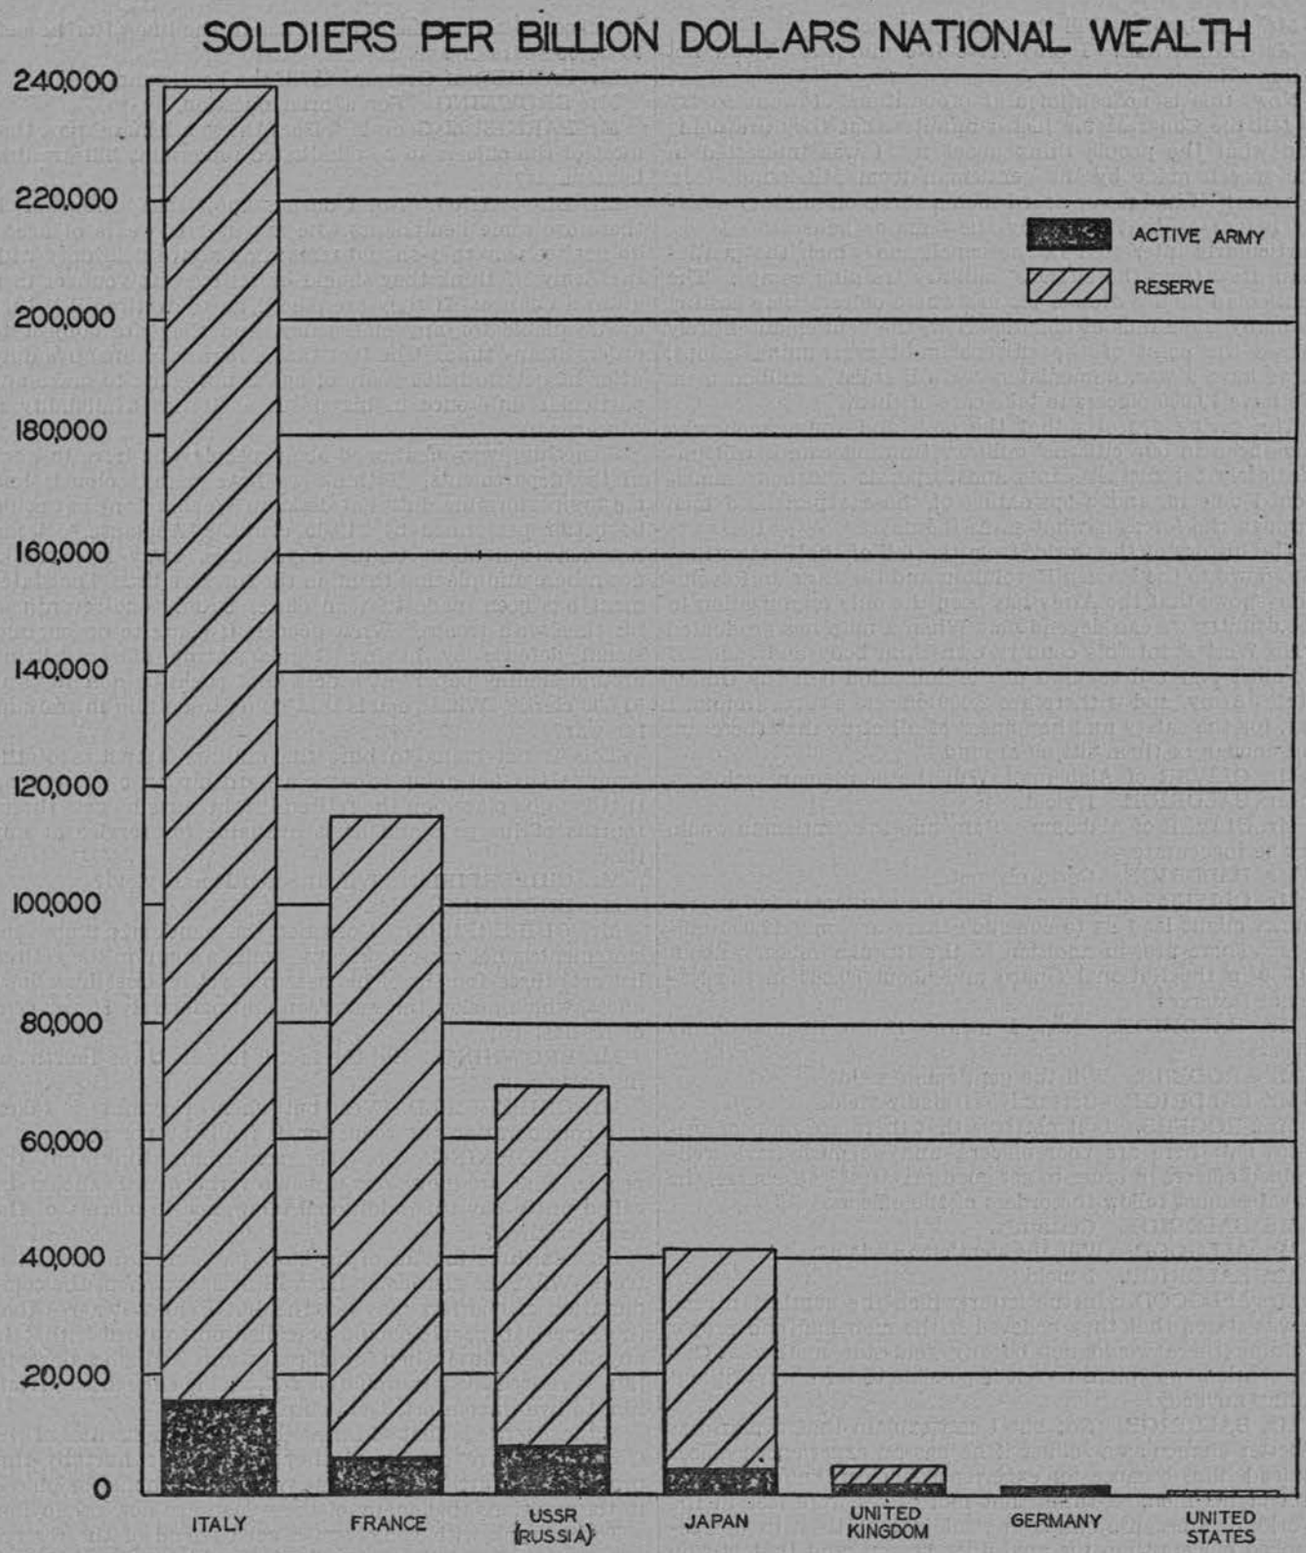
Now, we have a trifle less than 12,000 officers and 118,750 men. The pending bill proposes that the number of our officers be cut to 10,000, leaving the personnel as it is. This proposal might be justified if our officers were not obliged to train our entire reserve forces, officers as well as enlisted men.

I simply present these facts to show that we have gone just as far with cutting into our national defense as we possibly can within reason. This is the view of the President as recently expressed, and he favors economy—wise economy. I am glad to approve of all these cuts based on the fall in commodity prices; so is the War Department. But we say that when you make these cuts that absolutely eliminate activities of the Army it is going beyond reason. Our entire national-defense scheme works like a set of cogs in a wheel. If one part is crippled the whole does not function efficiently. So some of us here are trying to reason with the House and are asking it to decide whether this committee is right or whether those of us who shall support some of these amendments are right. None of us want a dollar of the people's money spent except in wisdom and in the interest of our general welfare.

Mr. KETCHAM. Will the gentleman yield?



Mr. BEEDY. I shall be glad to yield.



Mr. KETCHAM. Will the gentleman give just a moment's discussion to the effect that the 2,000 officers, who are far beyond their age limit, will have upon the promotion chances of these young men who are lower down on the list, and who will have to be depended upon for the real fighting strength?

Mr. BEEDY. The gentleman has heard that debated for years.

Mr. KETCHAM. No; I have not.

Mr. BEEDY. Well, I have, from time to time, for a number of years. I must confess that I do not claim to be an expert on that question. I do say that after listening to all this running debate for years I have concluded that the question of Army promotions might be argued from now until doomsday without securing a unanimous verdict. I feel that men like General Summerall and the present Chief of Staff, General MacArthur, probably know more about it than I do. By the way, the question of promotions is a distinct issue. The issue now before us is whether we shall cut 2,000 officers from our less than 12,000 officers in the Regular Army. On this issue both Generals Summerall and MacArthur say we can not with safety do with less than 14,000 officers in our Regular Army.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maine has expired. [Applause.]

Mr. BALDRIGE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, we heard an appeal from the gentleman from Illinois in regard to saving $9,000,000, and the gentleman used the word "appeal" a great deal. I would like to read something that to me is a real appeal.

There is an association called American War Mothers, composed of women who are mothers of veterans of the World War. One division of that organization is called the Gold Star Mothers, a division of mothers who lost sons in the World War. I have a note here that came to me, not at my own seeking, but two ladies came to my office this morning, and this is what they wrote:

Every gold-star mother believes that if her boy had had the proper training he might be alive to-day. If there had been more Plattsburgs, there would be fewer white crosses in France to-day.

Gold-star mothers are the most peace-loving people in all of the world, but since we do furnish the man power for our Nation's defense we feel that we have the right to urge Congress to provide our sons with all the necessary and adequate mental and and physical training, experience, and equipment. We are against any reduction in the Army appropriation bill.

Mrs. WILLIAM D. ROCK, Morristown, N. J.,
Mrs. NICHOLAS N. NOCK, Washington, D. C.,
The Present and Past National Gold Star Chairmen of the American War Mothers.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BALDRIGE. I only have five minutes. I can not yield.

Now, this is no sentimental proposition. I want to try to tell the Congress for just a minute what they are doing and what the people think about it. I was interested in the speech made by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS]. I had never heard such a thesis on military activity before as that made by the "major general." I was particularly interested in the conclusion which the gentleman drew from the citizens' military training camps. The gentleman finally drew a picture where officers were costing us many thousands of dollars. Now, the gentleman entirely misses the point of the citizens' military training camps. If we have a war, immediately we will enlist a million men. We have 12,000 officers to take care of them.

The saving grace is that the boys and young men who have been in our citizens' military training camps will immediately become sergeants and corporals and noncommissioned officers, and a sprinkling of those experienced men through the forces is what saves the day.

The history of the world, from the fall of the Roman Empire down to the French Revolution and the Russian Revolution, shows that the Army has been the only organization in the country we can depend on. When a man has graduated from West Point this country owns him body and soul. If we must ever fall back on one organization it is the United States Army, and if there are 2,000 officers sitting around, I say, for the safety and happiness of all of us that there are not enough of them sitting around.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BALDRIGE. I yield.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I am sure the gentleman would not be inaccurate.

Mr. BALDRIGE. Certainly not.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. But the gentleman by his remarks might lead us to conclude there are only 12,000 officers. There are, in addition to the Regular officers, about 13,000 in the National Guard and about 80,000 in the National Reserves.

Mr. BALDRIGE. Yes. I meant 12,000 Regular Army officers.

Mrs. ROGERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BALDRIGE. Certainly. I gladly yield.

Mrs. ROGERS. Is it not true that there are no poor privates but there are poor officers, and we must have well-trained officers in order to get good privates? Of course, the privates must follow the orders of the officers.

Mr. BALDRIGE. Certainly.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BALDRIGE. I yield.

Mr. ALLGOOD. In the letter which the gentleman read it was stated that they believed if the men had had proper training there would not be any gold-star mothers. Can the gentleman explain how it is possible to have war without killing anybody?

Mr. BALDRIGE. No; but I can explain that a man has a better chance as a soldier if he has an experienced officer to lead him, because an experienced officer knows how to protect his men. I think that more lives were lost in the World War because our boys went into battle with inexperienced officers than for any other reason, and that is why the gold-star mothers favor all the training possible.

Mr. ALLGOOD. I feel that more lives were lost on our side because, possibly, our boys were brave and wanted to go through and fight in order to stop the war.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I think I am as far as any Member of this House from wanting to hurt the national defense. I am not one of those who have any grievance against the Regular Army; in fact, I have great admiration for it, but I do not view the matter as the gentleman from California does, when he says that the placing of 2,000 officers on the retired list would hurt the national defense.

Anyone with the least observation knows that war is a young man's game. Anyone with observation knows that an officer or a man has no business in the line after he gets to be 60 years of age.

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWNING. For a brief question.

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. Does the gentleman know that most of the officers to be eliminated under this bill are first lieutenants?

Mr. BROWNING. No; I do not know that. However, if there are some lieutenants who are over 60 years of age, I do not see why they should remain on active field duty with the Army. I think they should be retired and younger men given a chance. If they are placed on the retired list, they are available for any emergency, and they are subject to orders at any time. The fact that a man is on inactive duty after he gets to be 60 years of age is not going to make any particular difference in his status as far as availability is concerned.

Something was mentioned about people who have to work in the departments. I think we have many colonels and majors performing duties at desks in Washington that could be better performed by $1,800 clerks. [Applause.] I am not disturbed about taking a few men away from desks down here and placing them on the inactive list. The statement has been made that an officer is only one-seventh of his time with troops. What good is it going to do our national defense by having Regular Army officers sitting around signing papers at a desk that could be done by any $1,800 clerk? What good is that going to do him in training for war?

This is not going to hurt the military activities of the Army. It is not going to work a hardship on a single man that is to be placed on the retired list, because he gets three-fourths of his pay, and he is available for service at any time.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWNING. Yes.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Does not the gentleman know his statement is not correct, because while a man on the retired list gets three-fourths of his base pay yet he loses his allowances, which makes the reduction approximately 50 per cent of his last pay.

Mr. BROWNING. But the fact is he gets three-fourths of his basic pay.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Yes; but when everything is taken into consideration the reduction is really 50 per cent.

Mr. BROWNING. Does the gentleman think that the people, who are now very much overburdened, should be called on to pay this additional allowance to officers of the Army, retired?

He gets three-fourths of his basic pay, and I insist that is true. What the gentleman from Illinois says about the commutation of quarters may be true, but I can not agree that the American people should be called on to furnish that to an officer, because when an officer who is as high as a captain is retired his pay would be reasonable enough to permit him to live in comfort, I am sure.

My insistence is that so far as the military activities of the Government are concerned they will not be hurt by this provision. I further insist that young men should be placed in the positions that many of these men are now occupying.

To be frank with you, I am a good friend of the reserve officers, but I think an age limit should be set for them, because when a man reaches a certain stage of his physical and mental capabilities he is not fit to be a line officer. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment. Mr. Chairman, there has been a great deal of discussion here, some of it, it seems to me, rather illogical and away from the point, as to whether the officer or the private does the fighting. A great deal of it has been with respect to what officers should be retired, and so forth.

There is one branch of our service where there is no question as to who does the fighting, and I refer to the officers in our aviation service. There is also no question but what the retirement plan that is provided here provides that practically all of the officers that will be retired from the aviation service will be first lieutenants, men in the very peak of condition to serve their country, the men who in the event of the opening of hostilities will be the bulwark on which we will have to lean until our land forces get into shape, because as long as we maintain control of the air for defensive purposes we are safe and will have an opportunity to get our Army and Navy in condition for attack.

These officers have been specially trained. It was stated on the floor some time ago, in discussing the Navy appropriation bill, that it costs from $35,000 to $50,000 to train and equip one of these officers; and yet we are placing these men in the same class and category as officers of the other branches of the service. I do not believe, from a military point of view, these officers should be sacrificed in the same proportion as the rest of the Army, for the reason that we now have a quota of 1,200 officers in the Air Corps and we are 300 under that number now. In other words, we have approximately 900 officers in this corps; and if this bill goes through, we will reduce them over 300 more and will have the corps reduced to less than 50 per cent of its fighting strength. Men that we have trained at tremendous expense we are to put in the discard, and they are men who are in fighting trim—lieutenants and flyers who are working on experimental work. I say it is very poor economy to waste this great reserve that we have and to put them on the same proportionate basis as the officers in the other services.

For this reason, when the matter comes up for amendment, it is my intention to offer an amendment to line 23, on page 11, by inserting between the words "addition" and "such" the words "shall exempt," so that the clause would read that of the officers to be released by the general board the consent of the Chief of the Air Corps shall be necessary to release the officers in that particular branch of the service.

This will not add anything to the amount of appropriations necessary, but will preserve to our Air Corps the most valuable asset we have.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Will the gentleman's amendment be so written as to limit it to qualified pilots?

Mr. HARLAN. Yes; my language was just a rough draft of the proposed suggestion.

I yield back the balance of my time, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last four words.

Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to take any unpleasant issue with the gentleman who made the statement that an $1,800 clerk in one of the departments could just as well perform the work of a skilled and trained Army officer as the Army officer himself, but such statements are absurd.

Mr. BROWNING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. I will.

Mr. BROWNING. If the gentleman is going to take me to task for what I said, I wish he would quote me correctly.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. I have quoted the gentleman as I understood him.

Mr. BROWNING. Will the gentleman allow me to make a correction?

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. If I may have a reasonable extension of time for the time the gentleman consumes.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time may be extended three minutes so that I may make a statement.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. BROWNING. The gentleman will remember that I said that many colonels and majors in Washington were performing a duty that could well be performed by an $1,800 clerk. I did not say that the duties of a colonel or a major who is skilled in his line of work could be performed by an $1,800 clerk.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. The gentleman said, "as well performed," as I understood him. Now, I do not want to misrepresent the gentleman.

Mr. BROWNING. I am sure the gentleman does not.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. And, most certainly, I would not attempt to belittle or speak lightly of the gentleman's military service. I have no question that the gentleman was a good soldier, and I do not have any doubt now that he wants to make a fair statement here, but I do say when a gentleman on this floor makes the statement that a colonel of the Army who in that grade is from an assignment in the War Department, and I know the nature of the assignments there well enough to know that he will not be assigned to a task that can be done "as well" by an $1,800 clerk unskilled in military duties. It is unfair to the Army officer who is being classified with an $1,800 clerk, and it is also unfair to the service, and it is equally unfair to the War Department.

As a matter of fact, it is just as absurd as this proposal to strike 2,000 of the splendid officers of the Army from the active list in the ruthless manner proposed and to place them upon the retired list.

When the gentleman makes the statement that this can be done without any harm to the service, I take the most vigorous issue with him in that respect.

Let me tell you why I say it is absurd to strike this number of active officers from the list. In the first place, some 18,000 of these officers are required for duties of one kind or another by our national defense act.

We have about 12,000 officers now, and this proposed measure would reduce the active officers of the Army by about 2,000. We have a plan under the national defense act for the defense of this Nation in time of war, and you can not remove 2,000 trained officers from the Military Establishment of the United States without doing a great harm to the service that could not be corrected in many years.

The Chief of Staff, General MacArthur, has pointed out that we have two sources in this country for the creation of an army. One is for an army composed of citizens rallying to the defense of a nation, and the other is for a conscript army.

There is no halfway house between the two.

It is not fair to say that because there are 117,000 private soldiers in the United States to-day that it is overofficered by 12,000 commissioned personnel. These commissioned officers are the framework upon which an army would be built in time of war.

Now, so far as the proposed reduction of officers is concerned, nothing could be more unscientific.

You are retiring men under this plan purely by age.

No one who has any idea of military history would say that an officer over 60 should be retired on account of age.

Look at Von Moltke and Von Hindenburg, Von Bismarck, and others, who led their men to glorious action when they were approaching 80 years of age. It is an unwarranted slander on the officers of the Army of the United States to say, in view of their health, their condition, and their energies, that they are becoming surplus and worthless at the age of 60 years.

Mr. BROWNING. Does the gentleman know that Hindenburg was taken from the retired list?

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. I have no doubt Hindenburg was on the retired list; but when you take an officer and put him on the retired list for years without the advantage of schools and training, he can not keep abreast of the times and you have markedly decreased his efficiency and worth. To suddenly restore him to active duty would be to the detriment of the service.

Do you know that you are retiring the Chief of Ordnance, General Hof, because his actual rank is only that of colonel.

Under this plan you are retiring the Judge Advocate General of the Army, Gen. Blanton Winship, a fine officer. You are retiring every other judge advocate in the Judge Advocate General's Department until you leave, out of 80 or more, only 27, and of these there is only one who has had any sort of experience in a civil court. You are retiring Col. Tenny Ross and many others who acted as chiefs of staff and led the advance in the World War, and who, in view of their experiences, would be more valuable than any other men who might be left in the various grades, merely because they were younger.

Mr. BROWNING. General Pershing is on the retired list.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. General Pershing is as much in the active service as he ever was. He is a general of the Army and would be subject to any active duty.

If you are going to retire men, retire them on some sensible plan, and not merely because of age. Retire them on some plan where you seek efficiency in the service, and not because they are the older men.

Let me read you some of these statistics:

There is a rating known as "superior," another as "excellent," and still another as "satisfactory"; and these ratings are made with much care and fairness every year. Of the officers you propose to retire, 79 are of the superior grade, the brightest, best minds of the Army, men who are looked up to by their associates, men who are an ornament to the profession of arms. Then there are 709 whose standing is excellent, the next degree.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. There are 710 of these officers proposed to be retired whose standing is satisfactory.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. And will not this thing rid the Army of practically all of the noncommissioned officers, the men who came in from the National Guard and from civil life?

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. That is so. I was about to come to that.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. It is not a direct favor to these obnoxious West Pointers—this plan?

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Not at all. I put into the RECORD yesterday—because I thought the House would like the information—a list of the commissioned officers who are to be retired under this law, with the place where they come from, not that that makes any difference; whether they came from the Military Academy or were emergency officers or coming in from civil life.

As I compute it, about 40 per cent of these officers you are now trying to retire are men that so many sneer at, the graduates of the Military Academy; and about 60 per cent of the officers came from civil life. This latter class came from the emergency officers, from the men like my friend [Mr. BROWNING], who heroically performed their duty in the World War in the service of the United States. I am sure that what the Army needs at this time is not only these efficient officers from West Point, these regular officers of the service, with whom I served for nearly three years with so much delight; but it also needs the influence of men who come from civil life, men who entered the Army for the emergency. You can not well dispense with these men. The loss of either of these classes would be great and irreparable.

To get now to the subject of the unfairness of this plan to them, they started out in the profession of arms and they had a right to anticipate promotion with increase of pay, they had a right to anticipate under the law that they might stay in the service until a retiring age, they had a right to anticipate, because they can not save otherwise, that they might have all the emoluments and benefits of their position. I say again that the man who retires to-day in any grade in the United States Army will receive substantially 50 per cent of the pay that he is receiving at the time he retires. And so, gentlemen, ordinary fairness to the officers that this bill seeks to retire requires that such provision should be stricken out and should not have the approval of this House. To do less would be to work a great injustice. [Applause.]

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I can not agree with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHIPERFIELD] that the retirement of these 2,000 officers will wreck the Army of the United States. He speaks about the possibility of promotion that will be denied these 2,000 men. I would have you consider that if that promotion is to be had it is going to be very slow, indeed; and if this amendment carries then, men who are lieutenants will be lieutenants until they are retired for age. You had better give the young men an opportunity to be advanced. These men who are now occupying these offices, who will be placed on the retired list or on the inactive list, have had their training and have had their fling. Why not give the young officers upon whom we must depend a chance, if we ever get into another war. Rather than diminishing the efficiency it will add to the efficiency of the Army of the United States if these old officers are put on the inactive list.

I want to say a word in answer to the argument of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BEEDY]. He had a beautiful chart here showing the relative size of the armies of the different countries in Europe as compared with ours, taking into consideration their respective national wealth. He showed a great big black mark representing the army that Switzerland has, as compared with her national wealth, and that of France and Italy and Germany and England. Why, there is no comparison between our position and theirs. True, we are the wealthiest nation on the face of the earth; but we have this wealth because we have kept out of war, while these other countries have been constantly plunging into war. Switzerland of necessity has to have a large standing army, for the whole country is not as big as a county in Nebraska or Indiana, and her army is a nonpaid civilian army; everybody belongs to it.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. And the Swiss Army is entirely civilian, without any regular officers at all.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That is true. Speaking about the number of officers, we have 12,000 officers to-day in an army no larger than that of England, and she only has 5,000 officers. Our country is isolated and we are not threatened upon any side by a border territory, and we do not have to watch every moment in the day and night lest advantage be taken by some one across the border. You can not travel over Europe but you are awakened half a dozen times during the night by customs officers because of the fact that you have crossed from one country into another. It is unfair to make such a comparison. I would have you understand that the Army of the United States to-day is costing the American taxpayers three times as much as it cost before we got into the World War. Is there anybody here who is apprehensive that we are going to get into war in the near future? We better be a little bit more apprehensive about the Treasury of the United States. Do not be carried away by false alarm.

I know that the Army has a lobby here constantly, and we are beset on every hand by these groups, not only of the Army but of others that I might mention who have some selfish purpose, but there is nobody to represent those back home except we do it ourselves—the burden bearers of this country, the men and women who are paying the expenses of the Army and the Navy, which is more than three times what these respective services cost us before the war.

We should heed the voice of the people. We should pay some attention to the man on the farm who can not to-day pay his taxes, by reason of the economic conditions of this country. It would not hurt the Army; it will help the Treasury of the United States; it will please the taxpayers of the Union if this amendment is not adopted. [Applause.]

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] asked a very pertinent question:

Is anyone apprehensive that we are going to get into a war to-morrow?

Let me answer the gentleman by saying that prior to 1917, the great majority of our people did not think that we would get into war. We were unprepared. In 1898 the war with Spain was unexpected and we were not prepared. Neither were we prepared for the Civil War. We were not prepared for the War of 1812. We have never been prepared in this country for war.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Does the gentleman expect we will ever be prepared to the extent where we will be immediately able to defend ourselves against any or all the nations of the earth? It is absolutely impossible for this country to be prepared in the sense the gentleman would have them believe they should be prepared.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, that is the best argument in favor of the amendment which the gentleman from California [Mr. BARBOUR] is going to propose that I can think of. [Applause.]

Now, the fact remains we have never been prepared, and the 1920 act was passed for the purpose of trying to assure reasonable preparation in the event of future armed conflicts—preparation for defense and not for offense.

None of us want war; but in 1914, before Germany and England and France entered into war, a short time before the declaration of war, at a banquet held in London the ambassadors of those countries spoke about their love for each other, and the fact that the days of war were over. Yet within two months of that banquet the worst war in the history of all time was being waged.

We must think of the welfare and safety of 122,000,000 people.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I always yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman explain to this House why it is that it is necessary for the Army of the United States to have an infinitely greater proportion of commissioned officers than it is for the great militaristic armies of Europe?

Mr. McCORMACK. For the very reason that we do not maintain in the United States the military theories of European nations but we are maintaining the groundwork of a civilian army through civilian training, under the leadership of Regular Army officers, cooperating with the other reserves, the National Guard, the citizens' military training camps, the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, the Regular Army being the leaders in the training, in order that in the event of war or in the event of danger we will have trained officers and enlisted personnel in this country that we may call upon. Such a policy requires for its success a larger officer personnel. [Applause.]

We have never stood for the European espionage system. We have never stood for the European military system. That is one of the reasons why our forefathers fought during the Revolutionary War—to try to get away from European conditions and policies and principles which existed at that time. We have always tried to keep away from those policies and those principles. We do not want a large standing army but we want a good respectable standing army, which will be well officered and trained, and behind that will be the National Guard; behind that will be our civilians, young men; behind that will be others who are interested, so that in the event of war we will at least be prepared to some extent and not be wholly unprepared as we have been for every war of the past.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield.

Mr. MAY. What does the gentleman think about the idea of proposing a reorganization of the United States Army in an appropriation bill?

Mr. McCORMACK. Well, of course, I think that the Appropriations Committee should be very careful before they undertake to legislate in an appropriation bill. They are usurping the functions and the jurisdiction of a legislative committee and it should only be done with the greatest caution. [Applause.] In this particular case it is unnecessary and unwise.

Now, there is another great question involved, whether or not we are going to have the pacifists determine our policies or whether or not we are going to have respect for the dignity and protection of our country. [Applause.]

I respect my friend, the gentleman from Mississippi. He is just as good an American as anybody in this country. He is a fine gentleman. He belongs to a school in this country which believes there should be no army and no navy. There are some in this country who believe that way; that we should show the world our altruism by being defenseless.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COLLINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield.

Mr. COLLINS. The gentleman's statement is wholly untrue.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman is expressing his opinion, and I am glad to hear the gentleman say that; but I have expressed my opinion.

Mr. COLLINS. I am saying that to the gentleman so that the gentleman will not make the statement any more. The gentleman's statement about me is wholly untrue.

Mr. McCORMACK. Does the gentleman believe in pacifism?

Mr. COLLINS. I do not; and I maintain that it can be demonstrated to any fair-minded person that there is not a proposition in this bill that should not have the support of every advocate of an efficient and effective military establishment.

Mr. McCORMACK. Very well. The gentleman indicates in this bill that pacifism is predominant. [Laughter and applause.] Permit me to read one paragraph on page 60 of this bill:

Provided further, That none of the funds appropriated in this act shall be expended for or on account of any educational institution not essentially a military school which does not leave the election of military training to all students enrolled therein, and this appropriation shall be available, in accordance with law, to such institutions as maintain elective military training courses.

Just think in time of war what this would mean. They would place the question of military training before the students for consideration and ask: "Do you want military training or not? You can vote one way or the other." Can you imagine the schools leaving it to the personnel of the school, the students, taking the power away from the faculty? This is what the pacifists have been trying to put into the law of this country and in the appropriation bills for the past several years. They say such schools are breeders of war. That is the argument of the pacifists, and that is the best answer to the gentleman's statement. The bill is permeated with pacifism.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? The gentleman is jumping at conclusions.

Mr. McCORMACK. It is the only conclusion that can be reasonably arrived at.

Anything which is destructive of our national defense under the guise of economy is false economy. That is not the kind of economy the people of this country want. They want real economy. They want a reorganization of departments and bureaus and the elimination of bureaucracy. They do not want economy at the expense of our national defense.

The people of America are watching this bill. The people of America are also proud of our Army and our Navy and of the type and character of men who serve therein. The great rank and file of the people of America stand for adequate defense, stand for an adequate Army and Navy that will assure protection of our people, our wealth, and, as the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BEEDY] so well said, of our shores, and of our institutions of government. We have enemies in this world, just the same as every Member of this House has enemies in his district. Other nations are jealous of our success.

War is not a thing of the past. Armies are maintained in Europe to-day, for what purpose? They are maintained in anticipation of war. They do not want war, but in the event of war they want to be prepared. I do not want war, but who can say that we are never going to have a war in the future? And if we do have a war, let us at least know that in our day, and on this occasion so far as this bill is concerned, we voted to have our country as well prepared as we could under the circumstances.

We have never been prepared for any war that we have entered. At least, let us have some semblance of preparation.

The reduction of 2,000 officers is destructive of our national defense so far as our Army is concerned. The elimination of the Citizens' Military Training Corps is another step in that direction, another attack against adequate defense, and a step in the direction of pacifism.

The elimination of 7,200 boys from the Reserve Officers' Training Corps camp is another step in the direction of pacifism.

The elimination of our Organized Reserves by the payment of only a dollar a day, and then saying that it is for meals is absurd. That is no proposition to put up to any respectable body of men, who have a regard for proper preparations for defense in the event of attack. That is another step in the direction of pacifism. The provision that I have just read appearing on page 60 of the bill caps the climax and shows that the whole purpose is to try to economize at the expense of national defense. A few million dollars saved at the expense of our national defense is not the kind of economy that our people are looking for. [Applause.]

Mr. COLLINS and Mr. GOSS rose.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention to read further than line 15, on page 8, to-day. When we reach line 16, on page 8, it is my idea to move that the committee rise. With that assurance I would like to have the Clerk read a while, so that we can approach that point.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, when we reach line 15, page 8, we will come to the paragraph where we will meet the proposition of whether we will reduce the commissioned personnel.

Mr. COLLINS. That is right. With that assurance to the House, I would like to read a while.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it the purpose of the gentleman to ask that the House consider this bill to-morrow and dispense with Calendar Wednesday business?

Mr. COLLINS. It is my understanding that we will take up the consideration of this bill again on Thursday.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, one of the great past commanders in chief of the American Army once said that there was no right to strike against the public safety by anybody, anywhere, at any time. I am, therefore, taking this opportunity to speak for a few moments of the Organized Reserve and the Reserve Officers' Corps as components of that great organization.

We have about 80,000 officers in the Reserve Corps on the active list. We have some 27,000 others on the inactive list. May I call your attention to this fact, that in this bill, for the first time in the history of the world, has any nation ever asked its officers to serve without pay; yes, worse, to even buy their own uniforms in order that they may serve the Government which they love.

In the few minutes allotted to me I want to call attention to this fact, that during the last year these same officers put in, without any compensation at all, 1,325,000 hours, working in the winter months, in the monthly and bimonthly meetings, studying their problems, only to find that if this bill is passed without the proposed amendments that they go to camp this summer with no pay and with the allowance of $1 a day for subsistence.

During the last year there were 260,610 officers who attended 15,800 conferences without any pay. I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that most of these officers are officers of the late World War. They are getting on in years, and it will not be very long that they can exert their influence on the young men who attend our citizens' military training camps, our reserve officers' training camps, or on the enlisted strength of the Army.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOSS. I yield.

Mr. MAY. Does the gentleman mean 260,000 officers or 26,000?

Mr. GOSS. I mean 260,000 officers, and that means not all the same officers.

Now, in this citizenry army of ours we draw from the citizens' military training camps, our Reserve Officers' Training Corps camps, the Organized Reserves, composed of the enlisted reserves and the reserve officers, and for the first time in the history of the world—and I say this without fear of contradiction—has a nation ever asked its officers to prepare themselves to fight without being paid and having to buy their own uniforms, because on the basis of our training, each one of these active officers only gets training for 14 days once in five years. The pittance they drew when they used to draw under old appropriation bills did not even pay for their clothes.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOSS. I yield.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. In what appropriation bill did we ever carry money with which to pay for the uniforms of reserve officers?

Mr. GOSS. We have not; but we have carried money in the way of pay, most of which went to buy their uniforms because they were only trained once in five years, and the uniforms would not last that long.

We have heard about the citizens' military training camps and the Reserve Officers' Training Corps camps; we have heard from the able gentleman from Massachusetts with respect to the military schools, which are being thrown out under this bill, and I earnestly ask every man to put back every dollar that was in the Bureau of the Budget estimate for these citizens' training camps. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. GOSS. As an extension of my remarks I submit the following:

THE ORGANIZED RESERVES

REASON FOR THE RESERVE

The Officers' Reserve Corps was created for the purpose of making immediately available in war the comparatively large number of officers who have military or civil experience directly useful in war but who are not enrolled in the Regular Army or the National Guard. Its members are willing to keep fit and available for emergency service but either can not or do not desire to devote to the professioh of arms the lifetime of the Regular Army or the extended peacetime duty sometimes incident to National Guard service. The reserve is the comparatively inexpensive component of the national defense.

PROCUREMENT OBJECTIVE

It is desired to enroll and train in peace sufficient officers to provide, together with those now in the Regular Army and the National Guard, enough to initiate mobilization in the event of emergency. We need to carry on mobilization up to the time graduates of the first training camps become available, 115,000 officers. It is this 115,000 that we are endeavoring to procure.

Of the 115,000, we have 80,399 on the active list. There is a further inactive list of 27,811, but these 27,811 have not taken training within five years and we are not sufficiently informed as to their present personal and military status to make any plans for mobilization dependent upon them. Doubtless there is much good material in this 27,811, but it will not be immediately available for the initial days of mobilization. We now have sufficient active officers for the 33 reserve divisions contemplated by the 6-army plan, but we are very considerably short on officers needed to reinforce the Regular Army and for the corps and army troops that must be organized earlier to back up the 34 Regular and National Guard divisions of the first line. We are short both in the staff and in the line. For instance, we have only 8,000 of the 20,000 medical men that would be needed initially for mobilization. The present active Reserve Corps is about two-thirds line and one-third staff.

EFFECT OF SUSPENSION OF ACTIVE-DUTY TRAINING

The purpose of the Reserve Corps is to provide trained officers for war. It is fundamental that an untrained or incompetent officer is worse than none. He not only stands in the way of the competent officer who might be procured in emergency but he is, in addition, an actual menace wherever employed. When training ceases the third component in the national defense ceases with it. Without the reserve the Regular Army and the National Guard can not live one week in campaign.

First of all, thousands of reserve officers will be required to bring the Regular Army up to its war strength. The Regular Army and National Guard divisions at the front must be fed, armed, clothed, transported, and served in a thousand ways, largely by reserve officers. Hospital trains and hospitals must be provided, again largely by reserve officers. The peace organization of the War Department must be increased to war size, and the officer increase for that comes almost entirely from the Officers' Reserve Corps.

The reserve is a volunteer and popular movement. In America it is comparatively easy to start any patriotic movement, but those who have been associated with such movements know that the real difficulty is in holding that membership. Such movements survive storm and stress much better than they survive neglect. The stauncher spirits of the reserve will survive even neglect, but it is only human that many should be offended, discouraged, and lost on account of the lack of recognition that the occasional call to active duty implies. If we had the number that War Department plans show to be necessary for mobilization, we could afford some neglect, but we are already one-third short of our actual needs.

STATISTICS

The War Department mobilization plan calls for 67 divisions, with the necessary corps and Army troops to back them up.

Of the 67 divisions—first line:

Regular Army	12
National Guard	22
Reserve	33
Total	67

To initiate the mobilization and to maintain the Regular Army and National Guard divisions in the front line until training camp officers become available, 115,000 reserve officers will be needed. In detail:

To bring the Regular Army up to war strength	16,000
For the corps and Army troops needed to back up the Regular Army and the National Guard	38,000
For the command and business end of the war	31,000
For the 33 reserve divisions	30,000
Total	115,000
The "active" list (a)	80,399
The "inactive" list (b)	27,811

(a) Officers whose recent training and standing warrants their assignment to regiments, etc.

(b) Officers who have had no training within five years. They are usually dropped entirely at the end of one 5-year "inactive" appointment. They involve no expense.

(c) There are also 12,340 National Guard officers who have reserve commissions in addition to their National Guard commissions. They should not be included in any reserve totals.

SUPPLY SOURCE FOR THE OFFICERS' RESERVE CORPS, FISCAL YEAR 1931

Reserve Officers' Training Corps	6,000
World War	1,000
Citizens' military training camps	230
Civil life (staff duty)	1,750
From the rank (Regular Army, National Guard, and enlisted reserve)	1,000
Total	10,000

TRAINING—1931

14-day training	20,998
For more than 14 days (329 Air Corps)	762
Total	[1] 21,760

The Air Corps Reserve officer needs training every year, or he loses his ability to fly.

A medical or other staff officer should be ordered to active duty at least once in five years to be observed and refreshed as to his part in the war plan.

A combat officer, intrusted with the lives of men, should train at least every other year.

CONFERENCES

Period: January 1–December 31, 1930; number of conferences held, 15,800; attendance at conferences, 260,610.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, in 1916, by a happy and fortunate inspiration, the Congress of the United States, then under Democratic leadership, adopted the national defense act, and in 1920, following the war, by an equally happy and fortunate inspiration, the Congress, then under Republican leadership, adopted the Army reorganization act. By those two acts the Congress of the United States for the first time in the history of our land established a system of adequate national defense in case of emergency. That legislation was accomplished through great labor, after much discussion and persuasion, by which the people of the country were led to understand and know the necessity for adequate national preparedness.

We are now asked in the name of economy to change the laws enacted in these two instances, both the national defense act and the Army reorganization act, by amendments upon an appropriation bill.

I yield to no Member of the House in my devotion to economy. I voted for every proposal in the economy program except what I believed was another onslaught upon the adequacy of our national defense in the consolidation of the Army and Navy Departments. I have voiced my opposition to the soldiers' bonus proposal and have voted against it heretofore. I have voted against increases of pay for civilian employees. I have voted for reduction in the salaries of officials as well as of employees in the departments of the Government. I am not afraid to vote for reduction in salaries or in the compensation of men in the military service or in the civilian service of the United States Government. That is not the issue here, however. I shall vote for any real retrenchment proposal that is brought before us, but if we are going to revise, if we are going to change our system of national defense, if we are going to amend the national defense act and the Army reorganization act, let us do that by direct action and not by this subversive attack upon the defense system of the United States. [Applause.]

We are attacking the very services which come closest to the civilian population of the United States. I have had a son in the citizens' military training camps. I know what that service means to the young men of the land who have an opportunity to go to these camps in the summer.

[1] 21,760 is 27 per cent of the 80,399 active officers.

I have seen that service as well as the Reserve Officers' Training Corps in action at Fort Sheridan, in my district. Every year I try to make a visit to these organizations for the purpose of ascertaining just what they are doing. It is not only the military training which these young men are receiving, it is not only the improvement in the use of arms and in military tactics which these officers obtain in their brief service during the summer, but it is the civic morale, the idea of citizenship; it is the patriotism that is aroused in them when they have the opportunity to go to these camps and be employed in these services that are of even greater value to our Nation.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana rose.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I am just as deeply in favor of economy as my good friend from Indiana ever hoped to be, and I will vote to reduce bureaus and eliminate establishments. There are many things that can be done and I have repeatedly called attention to them; but let us not strike a blow at this great national necessity of maintaining what we have in the way of a permanent establishment for our national defense.

Some of us seem to think we are living in a millennium and that we have perhaps come to a time when there is no longer any danger of war. Some one asked whether we are going to have a war to-morrow. Oh, I remember what was said back in 1916, "No war and no possibility of war." I am not going to refer to those unhappy days, but only a few months later, in 1917, we declared war.

We do not know what lies before us. We do not know just what we may have to do. We may do something here that may be very dangerous to the welfare of this Nation. God forbid that we should take an untoward step at this moment, when the whole world suffers from social and economic, if not political, unrest.

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask at this juncture unanimous consent, in order to save time, to present a statement which I have prepared concerning a program of national defense, together with one or two actuaries from some of our leading insurance companies, for the benefit of the membership of the House in studying the question of national defense.

I am particularly interested at this time in the manner in which this approach to attempted economies is being made. I do not believe that when the problem of national defense, viewed as I view it, from the standpoint of its being not only national defense, but Government insurance, in which every citizen of this country is interested, is approached, that it should be approached in any such hurried fashion as is being done at this particular moment, and with your permission I would like to insert this brief statement prepared from the angle strictly of an insurance policy in which every citizen of the United States, of every age, is directly interested. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by including the data indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Chairman, let me direct your attention particularly to the personnel of both the Army and Navy, including all branches thereof, from the standpoint of viewing them in the light of their being our national defense, as well as taking into consideration the fact that at present our armament, personnel, and equipment are even below the recommendations of both departments (Army and Navy) for our peace-time strength. I call your attention to an intelligent consideration of the importance of our national defense through the eyes of each and every citizen of the United States of America from babyhood to old age. Our national-defense program, in my opinion, should properly be viewed from the angle of its universal importance as the only cover-all insurance held by every citizen and in which every citizen has an individual interest.

Taking the estimates secured from the United States Chamber of Commerce, the National Industrial Conference Board, and other authentic sources, we find the estimated national wealth as of 1930 amounting to $329,700,000,000. Dividing this into private wealth and public wealth, we find the private wealth amounting to $309,195,000,000 and the public wealth to $20,505,000,000. From the standpoint of wealth insurance we find our Army and Navy military-purposes budget for 1933 totaling $639,297,000; and considering this sum as the insurance premium paid, we find the premium to be at the annual rate of $1.94 per $1,000 of our national wealth per annum. This, distributed evenly among the 125,000,000 citizens of the United States, gives us our per capita national-wealth insurance at the rate of 1 cent 5½ mills ($0.0155) for each 1,000 of our population per annum, leaving the fraction per citizen so infinitesimally small that it is not even necessary to figure it out. By comparison we find that for the purpose of protecting our private wealth against all casualties, such as life, fire, demolition, etc., the aggregate premiums paid to insurance companies by private citizens of the United States as organizations and individuals amounted in the case of life-insurance premiums to $3,000,000,000; fire insurance, $1,000,000,000; casualty, etc., all claims, to $901,651,215—making the total of all premiums paid the sum of $5,001,651,215.

We find, therefore, that the total annual combined insurance premiums of $5,100,651,215 paid on our estimated private wealth of $309,195,000,000 is at the rate of $16.1763 per $1,000 of above estimated private wealth. Distributing this aggregate premium evenly between our total population, the per capita cost of our private insurance would be at the rate of $0.1294 for each 1,000 of our population. The average life-insurance-premium rate per $1,000 of life insurance alone is $25.50. By comparison, the average combined national insurance rate, as set out above for 1933, per $1,000 is $1.94.

Breaking down the 1933 Budget, covering all departments of the United States Government, we find this interesting result: Total Budget of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, $3,942,754,614; War Department (military purposes), $296,297,000; Navy Department, $343,000,000. I direct your attention to the fact that the sum total allocated to national defense is but 16.2 per cent of the total Government Budget—7.5 per cent charged to the War Department and 8.7 per cent to the Navy Department.

Applying the insurance basis to the War Department budget and providing full coverage for national wealth, human life, property, business, etc., we find the ridiculously low rate of $0.925, or 92 cents and 5 mills a year per $1,000 of national wealth.

On the basis of distribution among citizens of our Nation we find the rate to be $0.0074 per year per million of our population per annum.

I am hoping that this statement will be of some value to the membership in arriving at a sane, reasonable, and constructive attitude toward the solution of our economic problem, and am allowing myself to indulge in the belief that we will not deprive any citizen of both protection and insurance by crippling or rendering less efficient or less valuable to us as citizens the national defense of this country.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last 10 words.

Mr. Chairman, I do not know but that you will have to have a survey on me, because I am one of those old, senile officers, according to Mr. COLLINS, who are now being retired. I reached my senility five years ago, but, Lord, how I love a fight. I have not got over that yet.

Of course you see the genesis of this whole bill in the preliminary remarks of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS], who gave you his theory of war and his policies for waging it. For God's sake, I hope you will not follow his leadership. He presented to you his theory and policies as to how armies should be organized. He quoted from a distinguished captain—captain, mind you—generals and admirals do not amount to anything with him, only captains and majors. He told you how this English captain would organize armies, and he told you how that English captain would provide a national defense, and then, carrying the matter to the end, he tells you how he would run our Army. My God, think of the Appropriations Committee permitting the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS] to write his theories of armies and his theory of the organization of armies into a bill. It makes your blood boil to think such things could be done in this distinguished body. I can not understand an organization that will permit such things to be done. [Applause.]

I know something about the national defense act. As I told you here yesterday, I was a close friend of another Mississippian, who came to Oregon, thank God, in the early days, the late Hon. George E. Chamberlain. Just before the World War broke out there came a realization to our people that we were unprepared, that we had gone into every war preceding the World War unprepared and had enacted our laws for carrying on the war after war had been declared.

Senator Chamberlain sat here much of the time getting his southern friends up to his committee hearings. He told me all about it. He plugged away at it and he got a great fund of information. It comprises all the history of the world on national defense. At last he prepared that great national defense act—not in 1920, but in 1916. That great act, prepared by a Democrat formerly from Mississippi, Senator Chamberlain, and a Democrat from Virginia, Mr. Hay. Do not go back on them, by southern friends. It was to save the Nation in case of war. We went into the World War and had this great national defense act. Never in this world did a nation carry on with greater efficiency. We had the greatest war President that we ever had working under this national defense act.

That national defense act was not written to carry out any pet theory on an appropriation bill. It was written after weeks and months of intensive study and with the best information that could be gotten on all military organization. It was the greatest piece of military legislation ever enacted for any country.

The act is like what my distinguished colleague from Maine [Mr. BEEDY] pointed out. The cogs all fit in. I am not going to plead for the 2,000 officers to be retired; I am going to put it on a higher plane than that.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. I am not going to plead for the 2,000 officers; I am pleading for the whole machine—all of it.

Now, this talk of 12,000 officers for 118,000 men shows the gross want of either intelligence or downright deception.

Take the General Staff for instance. This talk about these men being $1,800 men. These fine, learned, outstanding men, who have spent their lives for their country, being called $1,800 men. We have the great National Army, we have the reserves, we have the National Guard, and it is all a complete picture, and you must take it all in. It is not 12,000 officers for 118,000 men. Members should know better, or else they are grossly ignorant.

Now, gentlemen, do not disturb this Army in this way. Do not let the gentleman from Mississippi do that. If you want to amend the national defense act, bring in some legislative act under the advice of military experts.

You have your Committee on Military Affairs, with its learned chairman [Mr. MCSWAIN], who has been on the committee for years. If you want to change that act, the members of the Committee on Military Affairs are the ones to do it. They are familiar with the Army. Do not try to slip in changes through a side door, and, I fear, with ulterior motives destroy the defense of your country.

The following editorial appeared in a leading morning New York newspaper, which I commend to my distinguished colleague from Mississippi:

DESTROYING THE ARMY IS FALSE ECONOMY

As reported to the House the War Department appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1933 is what might have been expected from Congressman COLLINS, of Mississippi, with his record of fanatical pacifism.

It is in the name of economy now that Chairman COLLINS proposes the following sapping expedition against what is left of the Army of the United States:

Abolition of the citizens' military training camps.

Abolition of all annual training for the Organized Reserves.

Abolition of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps camp.

Abolition of military training as given in the land-grant colleges designated for that purpose by Abraham Lincoln.

Drastic reduction in the flying pay of the Army Air Corps.

Robbing what is left of the Cavalry of 500 horses without equipping that or any other branch with adequate motorized equipment.

In the name of common sense and American patriotism, the House should return this measure to committee for revision, or discharge the committee from its consideration and rewrite the bill in Committee of the Whole.

This is no emergency measure to save the Nation money. It is the same kind of pork-barrel pacifist legislation that Congressman COLLINS advocated last year.

A year ago this mis-Representative of Mississippi attacked not only the citizens' military training camps but also the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, and the Infantry, Cavalry, and Field Artillery arms as dangerous and useless agencies of defense.

Then Mr. COLLINS attempted to justify his pacifist program upon the ground that "our obligations under the Kellogg pact" committed us to such a course.

Now, with the Japanese Army in complete possession of Manchuria, with Russia mobilizing troops along her Asiatic frontier, and Europe refusing to disarm, Mr. COLLINS attempts to justify his sapping expedition against our little Army by changing his catchword to "economy."

The Collins type of legislator and the Collins type of legislation discredits the Congress and menaces the Nation.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I want to read just a little excerpt from the United States Daily, published this morning, concerning my speech yesterday favoring consolidation. It says:

Representative BLANTON, a Democrat of Abilene, Tex., characterized as humbuggery the recent proposal to consolidate the Army and the Navy.

Gentlemen, that comes from a reputable newspaper. It is a reputable newspaper. It is one of the newspapers that you would expect to print the truth. I do not think they intended to print a falsehood, and they must have made an honest mistake. I spoke yesterday for an hour in favor of this consolidation—that is, consolidating the War and Navy Departments into one department of national defense—which would save $100,000,000 annually.

Mr. KELLER. Perhaps they did not understand you. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. It just shows you how important the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is to the Members of Congress. My speech is in that RECORD, beginning on page 9849. Read it and see if you think there is anything I said there about consolidation being "humbuggery." It shows that if it were not for the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD all of us here would be at the mercy of the boys in the press gallery.

Mr. SNELL. We are, anyway. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. No; we are not. Fred Emery is a fine fellow and he is my friend. Fred Emery wrote that. He did not intend to do me an injustice, and he did not intend to say just the opposite of my position, but he made an honest mistake. However, if your friends will do that for you, what would your enemies do? [Laughter.]

Mr. GOSS and Mr. MAY rose.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, just a moment, gentlemen. After listening to my friend from Oregon, the great retired major general [Mr. MARTIN], who speaks so eloquently for 5,000 surplus officers in the Army——

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. I did not speak for them at all.

Mr. BLANTON. We need him here, I guess, and I am not averse to having our other good friend, General CHIPERFIELD. The Army and Navy Club needs them as spokesmen and mouthpieces, and also I think they need General Goss here to help them.

Mr. GOSS. Now, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. GOSS. I just wanted to remind the gentleman that possibly the mixup in the newspaper came because of the extension of his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, no. Either General CHIPERFIELD or General Goss, I forget which, put the names of officers who will be retired in the RECORD, and they showed 90 from my own State that will lose their jobs if we pass this appropriation bill as written. The President says that we are going to have to cut the Budget $367,000,000. Do you know that if you do that, you are going to have to put somebody out of jobs? I remind you of this. Every time you put somebody out of a job you are going to find somebody up here on the floor trying to get him back. The governmental expenses must be retrenched, you have got to cut down this $4,000,000,000 Budget if our Government is to escape bankruptcy. But every time you find an effort made on this floor to properly retrench expenditures and to abolish some bureau or commission, you are going to find somebody here on the floor interested in the ones who are going to lose their jobs, speaking eloquently for them.

General MARTIN almost brought tears to our eyes when he spoke for these 2,000 surplus officers the War Department assures us it does not need.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Oh, now, be honest. Will you not be honest? I told this House expressly that I was not interested in the 2,000 officers.

Mr. BLANTON. No; but the gentleman's eloquence against our getting rid of them almost caused us to shed tears. We now have 5,000 surplus officers whom the War Department says that we can dispense with. Are you not going to follow its recommendation and our Chairman COLLINS and take 2,000 of them out of the Army?

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. No.

Mr. BLANTON. We do not expect you generals to vote for it. I am going to follow COLLINS and vote to reduce expenditures.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The country is indeed fortunate to have in this legislative body a distinguished Jeffersonian Democrat such as the gentleman from Oregon, General MARTIN. I have served with him on the Expenditures Committee and I personally know that he is serving here, although he has passed the Army retirement age, as a Member has indicated, as ably, as efficiently, and as faithfully as if he were 40 years younger. [Applause.]

In order to make this Democratic War Department appropriation bill a complete monstrosity, following out the policies laid down in it by the Democratic majority of the Committee on Appropriations, all the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS] had to do was to provide that only one dollar should be appropriated from the Treasury of the United States for the purpose of maintaining the Army, with a provision that the Mexican or Chinese Army be hired to protect our Nation and the lives of our people, should America be forced into another major war in these critical times of depression and unrest among the nations of the world. There would be just about as much sense to a provision of that kind as there is to some of the provisions that he and his Democratic colleagues have incorporated in the pending bill. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] has again taken the floor to-day and orated in favor of reducing the Army officer personnel by 2,000 in the name of economy. He again struts forth to-day and indicates that he is practically the only Member who is interested in balancing the Federal Treasury, in favor of economy, and in favor of the elimination of Government bureaus. May I suggest to the gentleman from Texas how he would best serve the welfare of the United States and the welfare of our people, if he must take 2,000 employees off the pay roll and place them on the retired list in the name of economy, he would be serving his country better if he advocated a retirement of 2,000 employees from the Prohibition Unit and let these 2,000 officers remain in the active military service. [Applause.]

Conditions throughout the nations of the world to-day, as unsettled as just before the World War, are such as should prohibit the weakening of our national defense as this bill intends. Is it economy to risk the loss of our Nation and the destruction of the lives of our people in order to save a few millions of dollars, with the situation in the Far East as it is and has been for some time, and with some of our foreign debtor nations trying to repudiate their honest debts, although in some cases they have already been shaved four and one-half billion dollars, as in the case of the French debt? The French Government, which has failed to pay even the small amount of principal and interest due on her greatly reduced debt to us, has appropriated sufficient money to maintain a standing army of over 650,000 men in time of peace, and greatly increased her air and naval forces.

While the foreign nations of the world are increasing the effectiveness of their war machines I, for one, will vote to provide sufficient appropriations to maintain an adequate national defense for our common country and our fellow men. [Applause.]

I believe that if I were to follow the gentleman from Mississippi and wreck the effectiveness of our Army in the name of economy, I would be betraying my country and lending aid and comfort to her potential enemies.

Talk about the Treasury! If in the near future we are forced into another war we might not be so fortunate as we were in the World War to have some allied countries hold off the enemy for six months or a year, and by the time sufficient officers are trained, the Nation might be overcome and the very lives and homes of many of our people be destroyed. We might also find ourselves paying tax tributes levied by some foreign oppressor nation. The taxes thus levied would be hundreds of times the amounts which are needed to provide and maintain an adequate national defense.

To hear some of these economy experts talk, we would be led to believe that the reserve officers merely join the Reserve Corps in order to wear a uniform on parade and become lounge lizards and tea hounds. We must not fail to realize that reserve officers spend over 1,019,164 hours each year in studying the correspondence courses, for which time given to the country they do not receive one cent in compensation. They do not serve for a selfish but for a patriotic purpose, in order to equip themselves to help maintain our institutions in time of the Nation's peril. It must be disheartening to these red-blooded American citizens in the reserve to find that the Appropriations Committee of the House of Representatives recommends in the name of economy that the national defense be wrecked.

If our national defense policy is to be drastically changed, it should be done only after careful study by the proper legislative committees of Congress. I do not believe it is economy to place 2,000 Regular Army officers—many of whom are West Point graduates—in the prime of life on the retired list with pay and force the taxpayers to maintain them as long as they live without performing any service.

I sincerely hope that the Democratic Members of this House will think enough of their party and their country to rise up and vote to strike out some of the indefensible provisions of this bill. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

For printing and binding for the War Department, its bureaus and offices, and for all printing and binding for the field activities under the War Department, except such as may be authorized in accordance with existing law to be done elsewhere than at the Government Printing Office, $500,000: Provided, That the sum of $3,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, may be used for the publication, from time to time, of bulletins prepared under the direction of the Surgeon General of the Army, for the instruction of medical officers, when approved by the Secretary of War, and not exceeding $95,854 shall be available for printing and binding under the direction of the Chief of Engineers.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of clarifying the record. Last year there was carried $157,500, which included traveling expenses. Wherever the words "traveling expenses" have been left out this year we have a lump-sum appropriation, and that has been reduced by 25 per cent. Am I correct?

Mr. COLLINS. The gentleman is partially correct.

Mr. GOSS. I would like to have that explained.

Mr. COLLINS. The travel items for the several branches of the departments, except the civilian components, have been reduced by 25 per cent. The travel item for rivers and harbors and flood control has not been reduced at all.

Mr. GOSS. And wherever they appeared last year they have all been lumped under one lump sum? After they have all been grouped under one lump sum.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

For contingent expenses of the Military Intelligence Division, General Staff Corps, and of the military attachés at the United States embassies and legations abroad, including the purchase of law books, professional books of reference, and subscriptions to newspapers and periodicals; for cost of maintenance of students and attachés; for the hire of interpreters, special agents, and guides, and for such other purposes as the Secretary of War may deem proper, including $5,000 for the actual and necessary expenses of officers of the Army on duty abroad for the purpose of observing operations of armies of foreign states at war, to be paid upon certificates of the Secretary of War that the expenditures were necessary for obtaining military information, $47,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War: Provided, that section 3648, Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 31, sec. 529), shall not apply to payments made from appropriations contained in this act in compliance with the laws of foreign countries or their ministerial regulations under which the military attachés are required to operate.

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee to tell me what this proviso on page 7, line 7, means, and what is the purpose of it. Is that similar to the proviso that was in the Navy Department bill, to provide for publicity for all information received from the intelligence department? Is that the purpose of it?

Mr. COLLINS. There are certain advance payments that sometimes must be made, for instance, for tuition; and this proviso is for the purpose of permitting that to be done.

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. It has nothing to do with making public certain funds?

Mr. COLLINS. No, sir.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

In the appropriation for ordnance service and supplies of the Army (p. 43, lines 10 and 11 of the bill) it is provided—

That $200,000 of this appropriation shall be available exclusively for the purchase of five convertible armored tanks.

There is nothing in the bill which would prevent the Ordnance Department from purchasing tanks of another type than the Christie tank and manufactured under other patents. Is this appropriation for the purchase of Christie tanks?

Mr. COLLINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. STEWART. The whole gist of the matter is that the Christie tank is probably the finest machine in the field, is eagerly sought for several countries, and has advantages which render it extremely useful both as to speed and multiplicity of uses. This machine would unquestionably take the place of large numbers of troops. It would appear to be a great addition to the armed forces, and is directly in line with the most recent military thought, which is tending toward a highly mechanized force rather than the employment of a large number of men.

Maj. Gen. Douglas MacArthur, Chief of Staff of the United States Army, in his testimony before the subcommittee (p. 12, hearings) stated:

The Christie tank finally passed all tests and we have ordered seven. My opinion is that it is the best tank that has ever been developed.

Maj. Gen. Stephen Fuqua, Chief of Infantry, in his testimony before the subcommittee (p. 666 of the hearings) testified:

My estimate is that it is the best tank produced up to date; it is the best in the world to-day.

General Fuqua also stated that the speed of this tank on an ordinary metal road had been shown to be between 60 and 70 miles per hour, and that the speed of the tank on its own tracks was somewhere between 35 and 40 miles per hour. General Fuqua observed and participated in the tests of the Christie tanks.

Mr. Christie assures me that his latest development in combat machines will make a speed over ordinary roads of 120 miles per hour, together with a speed of 70 miles per hour on its own tracks over rough terrain. It is possible to transport this machine by airplane to the scene of action, drop it at high speed so that it may immediately go into action. The machine carries a gun, shooting standard .75 mm. shells.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLINS. Yes.

Mr. GOSS. There is nothing in the bill that would prohibit the War Department from purchasing some other kind of tank if it so desired?

Mr. COLLINS. That is right; but it is the idea of this committee that the Christie tank is the tank that ought to be bought by the War Department.

Mr. GOSS. So that the record will be clear, there is nothing in the law that would force the War Department to buy that type?

Mr. COLLINS. No. As I recall the views of the individual members of the subcommittee, all were of the opinion that the Ordnance Department should buy the type of tank that the using department desires them to buy, and that is the Christie type of tank.

Mr. GOSS. Why was not the Christie type tank included in the bill instead of leaving it wide open?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Are we not anticipating page 43, where this item occurs in the bill?

Mr. GOSS. If this is going to be gone into at this time, I wish the record to be correct. The gentleman is asking for information.

Mr. STAFFORD. But we are in advance of the item under consideration.

Mr. COLLINS. Let me state again what I conceive to be the thought of the subcommittee, and that is that if the Ordnance Department abides by the wishes of the subcommittee they will buy the Christie type tank, because that is the type of tank that the using branches of the Government desire the Ordnance Department to buy.

Mr. GOSS. Where in the hearings was that brought out? I refer to page 619. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS] said:

General Hof, in that list I notice there is an item of $200,000 for tanks. Will that be for the Christie tanks?

General HOF. Yes; it will be for whatever tank the War Department decides is the proper thing to spend it for of that type. We have been thinking of manufacturing them in the arsenal rather than buying them from Christie.

Mr. COLLINS. That will be left up to the War Department?

General HOF. Yes, sir.

I refer the gentleman also to pages 630 and 666.

Mr. COLLINS. In addition to that, if the gentleman will permit, it is my recollection that General MacArthur has stated since then that the Army has decided to make standard the Christie type tanks.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Does the gentleman from New Jersey yield?

Mr. STEWART. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. I want to ask the gentleman the question, whether in his judgment or opinion in any appropriation bill they ought to have in mind the specific kind of tank which is to be bought by the War Department?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin makes the point of order that no quorum is present.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LANHAM, chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 11897), making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted—

To Mr. POLK, for six days on account of important business; and

To Mr. REID of Illinois (at the request of Mr. RAINEY), for an indefinite period on account of illness.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. HAINES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAINES. Mr. Speaker, the country is watching Congress at this time perhaps as they have never watched any similar body before. They are expecting from us such legislation and action as will insure a balanced Budget, and which I am sure will be accomplished within a very few more days, when another body will have completed the same. When it comes back to us, we should hurry final passage so that the act may bring to the Treasury such additional revenues as are needed to restore confidence in the minds of the great host of our citizenship, and which I feel confident will have much to do to bring about better conditions in every line of endeavor.

This is no time for either of the great political parties to be engaged in debates of a partisan character, but the time is here for patriotic action on the part of the President and every Member of both branches of Congress. We are going to have plenty of time after we finish our work here to go out and make political speeches. Our big job now is to get the unemployed back into the ranks of industry and this calls for patriotism on the part of the employer as well as upon us. We can not restore prosperity by any act of ours, but we can let the country know that we have provided the necessary legislation to produce revenues to get our own house in order. Every Member here knows the critical condition the country is in so far as unemployment is concerned and I wish that throughout the Nation men in industry would immediately arrange to put men back to work, even though they must make idle some improved machinery. That is the great task ahead of us. While the country is looking for relief from Congress, we in these Halls are looking to our industrial leaders for the same leadership that will give jobs to men and women. We can accomplish much, if we are a united people, having this in mind, and I sincerely trust that throughout the Nation this shall be our aim.

The pending appropriation bill shows a reduction of more than $50,000,000 and which I hope will be accepted by the membership. The people back home expect us to economize and it is our duty to do this, as we are the representatives to whom they must look for economy. I think the committee is to be complimented for recommending these savings in the War Department and while there is a reduction in the amount for the national park in my district, I shall not protest this, for I know the work will not be hindered.

Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the time given to me to-day for a brief discussion of the pending appropriation bill, because in this bill is an appropriation for the national park, better known as Gettysburg Battlefield.

Mr. Speaker, I trust you and my colleagues have visited this old battlefield. It is just a short drive from Washington, through a country noted for its scenic beauty, fine agricultural soil, rich in the history of our Nation, and inhabited by a fine, loyal, patriotic people.

Gettysburg is a thrifty small city of about 6,000 souls and is an ideal strictly American community. Here you will find industry taking care of the people who work in the several industrial plants within the town, and surrounding the town you will find the battlefield. Gettysburg has become quite an educational center, for here is located Gettysburg College and Seminary, where each year we send forth young men and women to make their contribution to the cause of education and the building of a finer citizenship. Let me suggest, Mr. Speaker, that if you have not visited Gettysburg National Cemetery, you do so at the very first opportunity. I was there last Sunday attending a Masonic service, and as I mingled with others upon that soil, made sacred by the blood of martyrs, where lie buried the finest of America's manhood, who made that supreme sacrifice in the great war between the States, and where both the "Blue" and the "Gray" are at rest awaiting that day when God shall call each one of us to join them, and then there shall be no more North or South, but all shall be one in that land of eternal rest.

The national cemetery does credit to this Nation and the day should never come when this Nation should not show its gratitude to those who made the supreme sacrifice that this Nation should be one, by any neglect that might result from a lack of sufficient appropriation to take care of this holy place, for to me it is holy, and as I walked among the markers placed to the memory of the "unknown dead" of both the North and the South, I was impressed with the words: "Take off thy shoes from off they feet, for the ground whereon thou standest is holy ground." I am sure, my colleagues and Mr. Speaker, that no citizen of this great Nation can go upon this old battlefield without an emotion that words fail to express. So, Mr. Speaker, I want to invite in this brief time the membership of this House to visit Gettysburg in this beautiful springtime season of the year, when all nature is smiling upon us. Within two hours' drive, beautiful valleys and hills and fine roads all the distance will give you a fine day of recreation. You will find in Gettysburg a hospitality that is typically American. Do not go to Gettysburg and drive over the field without the assistance of a guide, for you will little appreciate the spectacle of monuments, cold marble and granite, without the information these guides can give you.

I am rather proud of the type of men who conduct visitors over the battlefield. Their charge is very reasonable, and about 90 guides are engaged to do this work and have the complete history of the three days' battle, and the lecture they give you is beyond value. Gettysburg has fine hotels to take care of you, and their rates are very reasonable. Driving from here to historic Frederick, then through to Gettysburg, you traverse a country rich in the history of this Nation; but at Gettysburg you have the great turning point of the Civil War, and the result of which had much to do in terminating that unfortunate struggle between the States.

Let me recommend, Mr. Speaker, that in returning from Gettysburg you drive through to Hanover, a town of 12,000 people, where the first blood was shed above the Mason-Dixon line in the Civil War, and where you will find a little city bustling with industry and a city with unsurpassed civic pride. Then drive on through to York, the seat of Continental Congress during the darkest days of the American Revolution. For nine months the Continental Congress was in session in York, and it was here that was frustrated the conspiracy to take the command of the Army away from George Washington. You will find York a city of more than 55,000 souls, with a greater York population of perhaps 75,000. York ranks third in the great State of Pennsylvania in diversified industry, and here you will find several of the largest industrial plants in the world of their kind.

Then drive from York to Baltimore, down the old historic Susquehanna Trail, passing by one of the finest impounding dams of water, a project of the York Water Co., to be found anywhere.

This is my district, gentlemen, and I am proud to be their Representative, for I do represent a people for whom I can be justly proud, for never have they failed to respond to the needs of their great country.

The amount of appropriation asked for in the pending bill, I trust, will be adequate for the needs of maintaining the very high standard upon which this park has been managed.

Will you permit me, Mr. Speaker, to add that the park is being most efficiently managed under the efficient supervision of Colonel Davis, a fine gentleman, beloved by all who know him, and a credit to the service; and I am glad to pay this tribute to the great work he has performed in the past and which I feel confident he will continue to do. There are 29 miles of fine highways on the Gettysburg Battlefield, in addition to perhaps 10 miles in good condition but not permanently improved. I hope some day that Congress will be in a position to improve all of these roads and make this national park even more beautiful than it now is. A million people visit the battlefield each year, and these come from every corner of the known world. Many of our Presidents have delivered addresses at Gettysburg, and it was here that the immortal Lincoln gave that classic unsurpassed in all literature.

Every distinguished gentleman that visits the United States from foreign countries is taken to Gettysburg, and each one of them learns the story of the great conflict that gave to this Nation a rebirth, that gave to our people a realizatiton of its unity and a vision of its united destiny. To-day we have but a few of the valiant men of 1861–1865, and we can not perpetuate the memory of those who died unless we be interested in seeing that the unity then realized, the vision then seen, might be exemplified in us and the things that we do.

America is not ungrateful to these men, nor will we as a people ever mant to fail, through lack of appropriation, to perpetuate their memory.

The Gettysburg National Park was taken over from the Battlefield Memorial Association through an act of Congress signed by President McKinley February 11, 1895.

It comprises more than 16,000 acres, covering an area approximately 40 square miles, of which 2,530 acres are Government owned; the balance is privately owned or leased.

There are 841 monuments of stone, bronze, and marble on the field; 5 steel observation towers, three 65 feet high, two 75 feet high; 464 bronze tablets; 37 bridges and culverts; 5 bronze equestrian statues; 30 bronze statues on pedestals; 417 cannon on carriages; 15 sets of farm buildings; 4 southern monuments—Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, and Texas; and slightly more than 30 miles of paved roads.

THE MISUSE OF ADVERTISING

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks on the subject of advertising and to include therein some remarks by Maj. Benjamin H. Namm, of Brooklyn, N. Y.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me to extend my own remarks on the subject of advertising, and to include therein some remarks by Maj. Benjamin H. Namm, of Brooklyn, N. Y., I present the following:

Extreme exaggeration, ridiculous bombast, and actual distortion are words that might well characterize much of the advertising that is put forth over the radio, in newspapers, on posters, and on the screen. Next week's "talkie" is usually described as "the most thrilling, greatest sensation, most violently gripping murder mystery ever featured." U-pan-her tooth paste is radioed over station BLAH as one of the seven wonders of the world. The "None-Such" is blazoned in lurid colors as the greatest auto since the beginning of time. Macy's in New York have several times been cracked over the knuckles for their use of superlatives to describe their goods and practices.

By their continued use extreme words and exaggerations finally come to sound empty and hollow. They become as ineffectual as snow falling on an iceberg. There is a twice-told tale of a barber who had a competitor across the street. The latter put up a sign reading "I am the best barber in New York." Soon a third barber a block down the street put up the sign "I am the best barber in the world." The first barber was somewhat stumped; where did he fit in? One of his competitors was the best barber in the State, and the other was the best barber in the world. He thought a bit and then put up his own sign. It read: "I am the best barber in this block." Thus extreme exaggeration carries within itself the seeds of its own destruction.

However a far worse practice—one that is nasty and mean—is that kind of advertising that seeks to destroy by foul means honest competitors. It is the practice that distorts the facts and knocks and disparages other contestants in the same field. The worst offender in this regard is the American Tobacco Co. They sought to destroy the candy business by their slogan, "Reach for a 'Lucky' instead of a sweet." They sought to give the impression that all handmade cigars were made under unsanitary and loathsome conditions by the use of the various slogans advertising their "Cremo" brand. Strange to relate, it developed that in one of their own factories in Kentucky, where their own brands were made by hand, the ends of their cigars in that factory were "spit-tipped." The Better Business Bureau discovered this, to the dismay and chagrin of the American Tobacco Co. Thus it was hoist by its own petard.

One of the finest résumés of this entire matter is to be found in a speech made by my esteemed friend, Maj. Benjamin H. Namm, of Brooklyn, N. Y., before the Retail Trade Board of Providence, R. I., April 15, 1932, which is as follows:

INTRODUCTION

No merchant who has at heart the interest of his craft could feel anything but honored to receive an invitation such as you have extended to me to come to Providence, meet the merchants of your great city, and discuss with you one of the most vexing problems that confronts retailing to-day—the problem of advertising.

VARIOUS PROBLEMS

I fully realize that advertising is but one of the many problems that we retailers are facing. We are threatened with uneconomic legislation, we are faced with excessive overhead, our profits have reached the vanishing point, and we are surrounded on all sides by destructive competition. In my opinion, however, the problem of destructive competition is the most important of all. Supreme Court Justice Brandeis referred to this last month as having caused a greater crisis than that produced by the war. Secretary of Commerce Lamont made special reference to it last week as a great evil.

BELIEF

I am one of those who believe that the most practical solution to destructive competition lies in fostering the integrity of advertising. At the present time advertising is sick. It is suffering from autointoxication. Its blood stream is temporarily toxic from the twin poisons of exaggeration and abuse. Unless checked, these poisons may destroy the very life of advertising itself.

SUPPORT

Before proceeding further, let me state that I have always been a firm believer in the power of advertising. Ample proof of this lies in the fact that during the past 10 years our store in Brooklyn has spent over $5,000,000 for newspaper advertising alone.

DEFINITION

In the field of distribution, we believe that merchandising is that which moves goods toward people and advertising that which moves people toward goods. Properly used, the value of advertising can not be overestimated.

DECLINE

It must be apparent to everyone, however, that advertising has not been properly used by a large number of advertisers. On the contrary, it has been misused to such an extent that it no longer "pulls" as it should. What constitutes proper "pulling power"? I would say that every advertising dollar spent for direct returns should produce at least $10 in direct returns. I have met very few merchants who dispute this radio or yardstick and I have met equally few who tell me that their advertising produces any such full measure.

REASON

The principal reason, in my opinion, why most advertising no longer pulls properly is that it does not deserve to. A great mass of people have lost confidence in the printed word of business. Many have come to regard advertising as a waste. Others regard it as something of a joke. Some consider it a sort of "racket."

BALLYHOO

Witness the phenomenal success of the magazine Ballyhoo. The major aim of this publication was to burlesque advertising. In an incredibly short space of time, it found 2,000,000 readers who were willing to pay money to see the ballyhoo in advertising given a stiff dose of its own medicine.

CAUSES

I have already said that advertising was suffering from auto-intoxication and that the principal poisons were exaggeration and abuse. Of the two evils, exaggeration is the more prevalent. The number of offenders is almost as large as the number of advertisers. In the field of national advertising some of the largest concerns are the worst offenders.

DISILLUSION

How many of you are aware of the fact that consumers are seriously studying merchandise and the claims made for it by searching out the facts through an association of their own called "Consumers' Research (Inc.), of New York City." This is a nation-wide, nonprofit organization, headed by Stuart Chase and F. J. Schlink. It has 30,000 members and its own testing laboratory. It seeks to determine the merits or demerits of manufactured products and to prove or disprove the various claims made for these products by means of laboratory tests. If you will but read some of these reports you will be quite disillusioned by the obvious emptiness of some of the most familiar claims.

FACTS

We have been asked to believe that four out of every five have pyorrhea. Any medical society will tell you the true percentage is more like 1 in 20. We have been told that a certain mouth wash eliminates bad breath or "halitosis." Any doctor will tell you that it merely covers up one odor by substituting another. And so on, far into the night.

RETAILING

As regards our own field of retailing, I had the privilege recently of inspecting an old file that contained some of the earliest advertisements printed in New York City. I was struck by their simplicity and the complete absence of superlatives. One merchant announced that he had received a shipment of woolens from Glasgow via the brigantine Sea-Rover. Another merely welcomed his patrons to a new shop on Bowling Green. A saddler listed his wares and the price of each—that was all.

CHANGE

Ask any one of the 51 better business bureaus of the country to rate the value of present-day retail advertising. Most of them will tell you that the average newspaper contains numerous advertising statements and claims of a nature that tend to destroy confidence in all advertising. This includes exaggerated statements that tax credulity and comparative values that challenge belief.

PERSONAL

There is nothing invidious in these remarks. On the contrary, I am quite sure that our own store has offended just about as much as the average. We have no excuse to offer other than the poor one that is always advanced by our advertising manager. "It is standard practice," he says. He is right, it is standard practice but the ugly fact remains that our practices in advertising are far below the standard of our practices in private life.

ABUSE

Now let us look at the second poison in advertising, the use of disparaging and attacking copy. This is sometimes given the glorified title of "controversial copy," but call it what you may, it says just one thing: "Let competitors be damned."

ATTACKS

I will not take the time to detail the numerous controversies, attacks, and counterattacks that have been inflicted upon a long-suffering public through the columns of newspapers and magazines recently. The cigarette controversy, the cigar, tire, coffee, soap, restaurant, oil, and other controversies have all shown evidences of a dog-eat-dog spirit in business which is a disgrace to advertising. Furthermore, these advertisements inevitably create an adverse consumer psychology which does untold harm to the whole fabric of distribution.

CHEATING

Retail advertising has in no way been free of this evil. During the past year, the ugly word "cheat" has been resorted to and "fraud" has been more than broadly hinted at. To make matters worse, the offending stores have not been small ones, but among the largest and most influential in our great craft.

IMITATION

When I attended the annual meeting of the National Association of Retail Secretaries last February, I was told that these attacks apparently inspired similar attacks upon competitors in numerous other cities of the country. In one city a particularly offensive advertisement was copied almost verbatim.

OWN STORE

Confessions are good for the soul, so let me state that only a year or so ago our store adopted what we thought was a very clever slogan. It read "Manhattan can never compete with Namm's." We were using this slogan with considerable success when the better business bureau asked us to discontinue using it on the grounds that it disparaged those of our competitors who did business on the wrong side of the Brooklyn Bridge. We complied with this request but I can not say that we did it and liked it. We were too mindful of the fact that we had recently paid several thousand dollars for the slogan. To say that we enjoyed charging off this amount would be just another case of exaggerated advertising.

COOPERATION

The records of various better business bureaus throughout the country will show that there are many stores which are striving to build up confidence in advertising. Your own city, in fact, has a fine reputation in this respect. The records will also show, on the other hand, that there are stores both large and small which simply refuse to be bound by any advertising code, fair-practice rules, or fair-play standards promulgated for the common good.

RECALCITRANTS

Obviously, these attackers and raiders must be stopped. If they are not stopped, advertising may soon degenerate into an orgy of competitive mud-slinging from which it will take years to recover. No red-blooded store or individual will submit to attack without counterattacking.

CONTROLS

What can be done to curb exaggeration and abuse in advertising and thus preserve the integrity of the greatest ally that business has ever known? Let us review the various "remedies" which have been proposed from time to time. Briefly, they are (1) control by advertisers, (2) control by advertising mediums, (3) control by State and Federal legislation.

PREFERENCE

The objection to the first suggestion is obvious. A constructive advertiser can not control the actions of a destructive advertiser. As we have so often been reminded, "Codes of ethics merely bind the ethical." The second suggestion, control by advertising mediums, has merit, I believe, because newspapers, magazines, and radio stations have the power that is essential to police this situation. The third suggestion, control by legislation, should only be considered as a last resort.

CHALLENGE

I submitted these various thoughts to the publisher of a leading newspaper about six months ago and he said, "Why don't you call your shots? Why don't you tell us what constitutes improper copy?"

CODE

No sooner said than done. The following week I was on the train to Cleveland. Various merchants, manufacturers, and publishers, I among them, had been asked by the affiliated better-business bureau to assemble and do the very thing that my friend, the publisher, had suggested, namely, to draw up a code for advertising.

PERSONNEL

After several months of effort, the code was completed. Before reading it to you let me mention the names of some of the men who served on the committee so that you may judge as to its authorship and sponsorship.

Flint Grinnell, chairman of the committee, is manager of the Chicago Better Business Bureau. B. H. Namm is vice chairman. Other members are Gilbert Hodges, president Advertising Federation of America; Bernard Lichtenberg, chairman Association of National Advertisers; John Benson, president American Association of Advertising Agencies; Joseph Appel, vice president John Wanamaker, New York; Lew Hahn, head of the Hahn Department Stores; W. T. Grant, head of the W. T. Grant Stores; Samuel Weissenburger, of Halle Co., Cleveland; W. A. Sheaffer, president Sheaffer Pen Co.; H. Gruen, president Gruen Watch Co.; D. C. Keller, president Dow Drug Co.; and many others.

CODE

The fair-practice code, as drafted by the affiliated better-business bureaus' committee, reads as follows:

"Believing it to be of paramount importance to the economic and social welfare of the American people that practices in business should be more clearly established and firmly maintained on a plane of fairness to the public and fairness to competitors and to business as a whole, this committee proposes that business men themselves shall abandon and condemn any practice in advertising and selling merchandise, services, securities, and property of all kinds which may have:

"(A) The capacity or tendency to undermine public confidence in advertising announcements or other selling representations generally.

"(B) The effect of injuring unfairly the sales or the good will of a competitive product or service.

"To this end the following practices are considered to be unfair and against the public interest:

"1. Misleading advertising: The use of, participation in, publishing or broadcasting of any untrue, deceptive, or misleading statement, representation, or illustration in an effort to sell any merchandise, service, security, or property, or thing of any kind is an unfair and uneconomic practice.

"2. Unfair competitive claims: The use of, participation in, publishing or broadcasting of any statement, representation, or implication which might be reasonably construed to lead to a false or incorrect conclusion in regard to the goods, prices, service, or advertising of any competitor or of another industry is an unfair and uneconomic practice.

"3. Disparagement of competitors: The use of, participation in, publishing or broadcasting of any statement, representation, or insinuation which disparages or attacks the goods, prices, service, or advertising of any competitor or of any other industry is an unfair and uneconomic practice.

"4. Underselling claims: The use of, participation in, publishing or broadcasting of any statement or representation which lays claim to a policy or continuing practice of generally underselling competitors is an unfair and uneconomic practice.

"5. 'Bait' offers: The use of, participation in, publishing or broadcasting of 'bait' offers of merchandise wherein the prospective customer is denied a fair opportunity to purchase is an unfair and uneconomic practice.

"6. Deceptive statements accompanying cut prices: The use of, participation in, publishing or broadcasting of statements referring to cut prices on trade-marked merchandise or other goods in such a manner as to lead the public to believe that all other merchandise sold by the advertiser is similarly low priced when such is not the fact is an unfair and uneconomic practice."

UNDERSELLING

This code was received with almost universal approval. To the best of my knowledge there has been but one question raised and that has been in connection with paragraph 4, which deals with underselling claims.

ESSENTIAL

It so happens that I consider that paragraph to be the most important of them all. Show me any store or business which claims a continuing policy of underselling its competitors and I will brand that claim as both untrue and unfair.

UNTRUE

These claims are invariably untrue, because, under our highly competitive system, no store can possibly undersell all of its competitors all of the time. The reasons usually given to support such claims are specious and insincere. For instance: "We undersell because of cash savings, low rental, large volume, or what have you." Every merchant knows that these various factors are but small factors in the total cost of doing business. Strange as it may seem, the representative store in New York City which enjoys the lowest cost of doing business is a store which sells principally for credit, is located in the highest rental zone, and enjoys but a medium-sized volume. To complete the comparison, this store has never made any underselling claims.

UNFAIR

Continuous underselling claims, made regardless of cost, are invariably unfair. The more the claims are true, the more they are unfair. Let me quote from a recent ruling by the United States Federal Trade Commission:

"The selling of goods below cost with the intent and with the effect of injuring a competitor and where effect may be to substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly or to unreasonably restrict trade is an unfair trade practice."

PREDATORY

The merchant who advertises a continuing policy of underselling his competitors is a predatory advertiser. He does not care whether he destroys commodity values, public confidence, or good will just so long as his underselling "supremacy" is maintained. When a competitor sets up a price, he knocks it down. When his competitor meets that price, he cuts again and again. Eventually the weaker merchant must go down. You may call this "underselling," but I call it nothing more nor less than "cutthroat competition." Such underselling is a menace to business, and any merchant who is a menace to business is also a menace to the consuming public.

PRICE CUTTING

I hold no brief against occasional price cutting, which is the safety valve of business. In fact, I have strenuously opposed price-maintenance legislation for that very reason. But continuous and habitual underselling is something entirely different. It is evil, rapacious, and predatory. Let us applaud the merchant who sells as cheaply as he legitimately can, but let us denounce the merchant who denies his competitors the right to sell except at prices higher than his own.

HOOVER

In his acceptance speech at Palo Alto, Calif., President Hoover said:

"The foundation of American business is the independent man. He and the public must be protected from unjust competition, from domination, and from predatory business."

CONFIRMATION

I submit that the fair-practice code, if honestly adhered to, will accomplish just that. It will protect merchants and the public from unjust competition and from predatory business.

RELEASE

The code was released for publication on February 1 of this year. Since then it has been adopted by better-business bureaus, retail-trade boards, and various associations throughout the land. In some cities it has been subscribed to either in letter or principle by the newspapers, magazines, and radio stations of the country. In most sections, however, misleading and attacking advertising continues to flourish.

SUGGESTION

The suggestion that I have to offer is simply this: Let us put the responsibility for this situation squarely up to our advertising mediums. If these mediums do not see the need of excluding misleading and attacking advertising for their own good and for the good of advertising, then let us demand that they do so for our own protection. No merchant may reasonably be expected to advertise indefinitely in a medium that allows a competitor to disparage his honest statements and to attack his reputation, either directly or by implication.

CENSORSHIP

Newspapers now maintain a strict censorship with regard to financial advertisements and classified advertisements. There is no good reason why they should not do likewise with retail advertising.

RATES

As everyone knows, there is a general feeling on the part of merchants that newspaper advertising rates are too high and that they should come down. Publishers tell us that there are good reasons why these rates can not come down. I do not wish to go into the merits of that controversy at this time, but I submit that there is one method by which advertising rates need not come down. That method consists of improving the quality of advertising by the elimination of that copy which tends to destroy confidence in advertising.

COOPERATION

I do not mean to place the entire responsibility upon the shoulders of the publishers. Advertisers must do their full part not only by cooperating in this respect but also by eliminating from their copy much of the sameness and the cheapness that seems to characterize it at the present time.

VASTNESS

Advertising is a billion-dollar industry. Department stores and specialty stores spend almost a quarter of this amount. In contemplating this expenditure to-day practically every merchant is asking himself the question, "What price advertising?" Very few, I am sorry to say, are finding a satisfactory answer.

CROSSROADS

In my humble opinion the great industry of advertising has come to the crossroads. One road is marked "Constructive methods" and the other "Destructive methods." The better-business bureaus have clearly pointed out the right direction. Now let the newspapers, magazines, and radio stations of the country keep advertising on the right road and lead the way to a new era of honesty and decency in advertising and selling.

TAXES AND TACTICS

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, just after the settlement of Georgia, when Savannah was a mere village on the edge of a mighty empire, the sturdy settlers could be heard for some distance cracking their long whips, driving their cattle to market and to slaughter. The farmers who came to town cracking their whips were called crackers, and thus the good people of my State came to be called Georgia crackers.

These early settlers gained this badge of honor by herding and driving cattle, not by herding and stampeding their fellow men as is now sometimes attempted in Congress and elsewhere. These farmers of the pioneer days were serving mankind, taking care of their families in the country and feeding and supporting those who lived in the city. This is just what the farmers are doing to-day. In the early days, without the farmer the city people would have suffered. Then the farmer got a fair price for his cattle and other products. He supported the city folks and they supported him. Nobody had much money; no one needed much. They valued money as a medium of service and not as means of slavery. They wanted money only because, with it, they could better furnish food, clothing, and shelter for themselves and their neighbors. They did not want money as a powerful weapon by which and with which they could further impoverish the poor and drag men, women, and children to lower depths of degradation. They worshiped at the shrine of human rights and liberties and did not bow down to the golden calf of greed and base selfishness. They were men and women such as God would have build a great Nation and preserve it forever.

Thank God, these same people, their sons and daughters, still live out in the woods of Georgia, in the South, and throughout the length and breadth of this great Nation, to protect our rights and preserve our Nation if we will only let them have a chance.

Mr. Speaker, so sure as the sun shines and eternity is everlasting, so surely will our every liberty languish and die, our people perish and our national existence pass into oblivion if we permit the love of money, greed, and selfishness to destroy our great citizenry of country people.

Neither a great navy, powerful army, vast expanse of territory, hoarded billions of gold locked in vaults of steel, nor inventive genius, nor men of letters from universities of law or science could stay the onrushing tide of national ruin that would be caused by the destruction of the men who want the chance to labor for an honest living and the men, women, and children of the farm. Destroy them and you destroy all. Without them our Nation would never have come into existence and without them it can not endure.

You ask for the cause of the present depression. The answer is the failure to give the average independent citizen a square deal, the failure to work out a system giving employment at reasonable wages to the working man, the lack of profitable prices to the producer for his products and the overcentralization of political and financial power with the accompanying graft and corruption. These troubles must be remedied if permanent prosperity is to come back to our people as a whole.

Congress will probably adjourn in a few weeks, as the leaders are saying the program is about complete. I regret to report that, to my mind, the program of this Congress—whoever may be responsible for that program or claim credit for it—is an awful and calamitous failure and does not in the least solve and remove the real causes of the depression. On every hand is to be seen more shadow boxing, straw-men contests, smoke screens, and false alarms than ever before.

Leaders and men in high authority who claim to be doctors, able to cure all the ills our Nation is heir to, are standing by a patient stricken unto death with an awful malady that will cause death unless cured, and that speedily, and yet these doctors say, " We will do nothing to remedy or cure the disease. We will simply varnish his toe nails with a sales tax mixture, use economy powders on his nose, present our depression-relief prescription to the National Conventions for party platforms, and present our doctor bills to the people, asking them to pay us by sending us back to Congress."

Only temporary expensive paliatives have been offered by the administration and those following the orders of the Chief Executive. These temporary expedients are costly, of no value to the great mass of people, and only helpful to the international bankers and their business associates in this country and to the foreign debtors of our Government.

With the exception of two or three provisions or measures of doubtful value, the record of this Congress to date is as follows: Moratorium for the debtor nations of Europe costing us $250,000,000; $2,000,000,000 available for big corporations and $125,000,000 for purchase of Federal Land Bank stock, all as per request of international banks, with the entire bill and more to be paid by less employment at lower wages, cheaper farm products, salary cuts " down to the most humble employee," and a sales tax to be paid out of want instead of wealth, out of losses instead of profits, out of poverty instead of prosperity, and by those least able to pay instead of by those most able to pay.

It seems that of all times and occasions the present depression is the one for Congress and the administration to pass some wholesome laws for the whole people, and yet it is evident that this awful depression is to be seized upon and utilized as a means of rushing through vicious measures that Congress would not dare pass at other times.

Take the sales tax for instance; it is not only unfair and vicious as a Federal tax but it should never be used as a means of raising money for the National Budget. If it is ever resorted to at all it should be by the States, for State, county, or other local purposes and then only as a part and parcel of a tax scheme exempting from all taxes a reasonable amount of land and other property for home purposes for every family.

Some relief must be given to the poor man who is struggling to buy a small home or to keep the one he already has. The big financial interests openly admit that it is their hope to fasten the sales tax on the American people and then leave it there, and from time to time increase it until all taxes for Federal purposes will be raised in this way and thus get big incomes, great fortunes, and tremendous estates and inheritances relieved of their just burden of taxation.

I am unalterably opposed to this scheme to relieve the rich at the expense of the poor and to raise revenue for the Federal Government by drying up this reservoir of revenue of the States, thus destroying the people's every hope of cheaper State and county ad valorem or property tax.

Neither the sales tax bill nor any other vicious tax bill should have come up at this time to put additional tax burdens on the people.

I undertake to argue that all this noise about balancing the Budget is the sound of the whip that is being cracked to stampede the American people on to assuming additional burdens and into an abject slavery even as our good old Georgia fathers in the early days cracked their whips to drive their cattle on to slaughter.

Better a thousand times that the pyramid of a balanced Budget be not built if it is to be constructed by American slaves under the crack of the whip of political taskmasters and is to be a monument to lost human rights and a powerful nation of the past.

It is being said " the Budget must be balanced by a sales tax, if necessary, even though the sales tax has heretofore been condemned as vicious and unfair in every particular." The middlemen and profiteers say " balance the Budget while we regain and rehabilitate our scheme of getting the lion's share of the profit that should go to the farmer." The trusts and monopolies say " do nothing to disturb us. Loan us the people's money in $100,000,000 items and raise these amounts by the sales tax and the slashing of wages. The Budget must be balanced."

The international bankers say, " We are in a specially preferred class. We demand and get enormous loans of the people's money on security so poor and a contract so drawn as to make this amount of the taxpayers' money an outright gift to us. We also demand and get foreign debt cancellations and moratoriums causing the gift of the people's money to the foreign countries to be in an amount large enough to pay off all the present loans and taxes of all the farmers in this country and guarantee the farmers a fair price for their products forever, but what do we care? We are getting our millions and billions of money here and abroad, in full with interest and profits. We believe in economy, and the slash of salaries down to the ' most humble employee.' Put on the sales tax. Take off all our taxes. The Budget must be balanced."

The big newspapers, periodicals, and magazines say " even if the Government actually loses nearly $100,000,000 per year handling our papers through the mail, and even though we get our papers handled through the mail so cheap until if we had paid the same postage during the last 10 years that the poor man, woman, and child pay for that same poundage of first-class-letter mail, we would have paid into the United States Treasury as postage over $16,000,000,000 more than we did pay, or enough to pay off the balance of the soldier's adjusted compensation more than six times, or enough to balance the Budget more than eight times. What do we care? Do not pay the soldiers' bonus. Put on a sales tax. Cut salaries down to the most humble employee. We believe in economy on the other fellow. Some of the presidents of our big newspaper publishing concerns get in salaries and commissions, and so forth, $12,000,000 per year or $1,000,000 per month, while the United States Postal Service hauls and delivers our papers at a tremendous loss, creating an additional deficit in the United States Treasury, and putting the Budget out of balance. The Budget must be balanced. Increase the poor man's postage from 2 cents to 3 cents per letter, but do not touch the graft of the big newspapers.

" Balance the Budget. Cut the pay of the charwoman who crawls on her knees and scrubs the floor to feed, house, and clothe her children and support her sick, invalid husband, but do not bother our great salaries. Cut the pay of the men in the Postal Service who carry our papers at a loss to the Government, but do not dare pull our hand out of the United States Treasury. We are strong advocates of a full Treasury and a well-balanced Budget."

Ladies and gentlemen of the House, all this noise about balancing the Budget is the cracking of the whip to stampede Congress into doing things which Congress would not dare do under other circumstances. The men of great wealth hope to stampede the American people into a sales tax and then themselves dodge out from under income, inheritance and estate taxes. They want the average citizens of the Nation to balance the Budget. The rich do not want it balanced out of their fortunes.

People are being whipped into believing that the Budget must be balanced or all will be lost. Better for the Budget not to be balanced and some of the graft in newspaper transportation cut out, vicious bureaus eliminated, and useless expenditures curtailed, rather than a sales tax put on the poorest of the poor to sustain the orgy of waste and extravagance which has fastened itself upon the backs of our people. I repeat it is neither right nor proper for a tax bill putting additional burdens on our people to be passed at this time.

It was not at all necessary. Every reasonable economy should be brought about and millions should be saved by the elimination of useless expenditures. With this done enough money would be available for all purposes except emergency items such as moratorium losses and Government loans past and prospective, payment of adjusted compensation, and so forth. These and aid for the unemployment situation could and should have been handled by a bond issue just as emergency funds were raised during the World War. These bonds would have been bought at once by the big financiers as well as by the ordinary man who has any spare money.

Suppose the men of big means had decided not to buy them promptly and President Hoover had quietly but firmly told these financiers that there was a deficit in the Treasury, but that he had decided that it would be best to economize by eliminating useless expenditures, but that he would not stand for the cutting of the lower salaries or a tax bill putting new burdens on all the people and that the men of wealth must either buy promptly or their income, inheritance, and estate taxes would be increased so as to balance the Budget. There is no doubt about their preferring to put up the money in exchange for interest-bearing Government bonds rather than as taxes never to be repaid.

I voted against the sales tax, against the increase of postage on first-class mail, against several other specific taxes, and finally against the bill as a whole.

The wealthy sponsors of the sales tax, after its defeat in the House, hoped to make the tax bill so offensive to the public as to cause the public to say, "The sales tax is preferable to the bill that finally passed the House. Give us the sales tax." Suppose the bill which passed the House is more burdensome to some than the sales tax, even then it is better to bear this bad bill for a year or two rather than approve the vicious sales-tax system as a permanent Federal way of raising taxes to last forever.

Let us not sell the birthright of our people for a mess of pottage. But, it is urged that a sales tax is paid by everybody and is an easy way to raise money. This makes it more dangerous than money that is hard to get. If the crowd who gets the most out of the Government have to put up the money, there will be more real economy and less graft and criminal waste. Let all the burden of Federal taxes go on the backs of the poor and there will be an orgy of waste hitherto never dreamed of.

Some say the sales tax is paid without the purchaser really feeling it. I have heard this argument advanced in favor of every plan to plunder the people, put over since I came to Congress. This does not justify this tax. It is like giving a man a deadly poison that kills him without his knowing about his rapidly approaching demise.

The people are finding out that something wrong has been done to them. The great tax burden of our people is local—that is, State, county, and municipal—rather than Federal, and the adoption of a Federal sales-tax system will complicate and make more difficult the entire tax problem.

In a wild stampede to balance the Federal Budget there is danger of our wrecking the power of the States to balance their budgets and further wrecking the budget of the individual private citizen and small business man. We must not forget the people who are to pay these taxes. Their budgets are most important. I find that many Members of Congress are getting stacks of letters urging them to support the President's economy program or the House economy program, and yet ofttimes in the same letter are urgent requests for opposition to parts of the program affecting the writer of the letter. The great danger of a legislative stampede in times like these is that many, many worth-while projects and measures will be crushed to powder and forgotten.

For instance, the politician of the North wants to economize by cutting out navy yards at Charleston, S. C., and Key West, Fla., and transferring this work to the navy yard in his district, the net result of which would be additional cost and graft and gross favoritism. Others want the Budget balanced by discharging those whom they do not like and creating new and equally as expensive or even more expensive jobs for their special friends.

Too many want to crack the whip and cause a further stampede of Congress; and while "like dumb driven cattle" Congress is listening only to the cry of balance the Budget, they want to undo laws which grant and protect rights of the people to a much greater value than the cost of the particular statute. These same people are cracking the whip not only to stampede Congress into doing great injustices to the masses of struggling humanity but are increasing their burdens and losses rather than diminishing them.

This whip cracking and Budget-balancing cry is getting the attention of Congress away from the need of the farmer for farm relief, away from the vitally important transportation problem and the question of more employment at reasonable wages.

I refuse to be stampeded into forgetting that my farmers need and should get much better prices for their products, and that bills to reduce their taxes are to be fought for rather than measures increasing their taxes and that the States in their helpless condition can not be aided by the Federal Government entering the sales-tax field in the States and taxing poverty and distress. I will not be stampeded into taxing poverty instead of trying to relieve it; into taxing the poorest of the poor to raise money to give to international bankers and foreign nations; and into an outright delivery of my people, body and soul, and their every right into the hands of big corporations, bureaucrats, and other selfish interests.

Ah, Mr. Speaker, the tragedy of the whole situation is that all this noise about balancing the Budget will not help my farmers get a cent more for their tobacco or cotton this fall, will not stop a single mortgage foreclosure, will not put a single mouthful of food in a hungry mouth, will not clothe a single freezing back, and will not relieve the depression in the least.

All this Congress has done does not in the least solve the farm problem. My people, farmers, merchants, bankers, and all are more interested in a fair farm relief act giving them a fair price for their tobacco and cotton than about paying a deficit created by graft and vicious laws and now sought to be paid by taxing and slashing the salaries of the poor, when that deficit should never have been created and when created should be overcome by a bond issue.

The trouble with our country is that we are enmeshed in an economic system by which and under which the farmers and common people are enslaved and forced to pay tribute to tobacco corporations paying—even during this depression—unconscionable dividends to their stockholders and a million dollars a year as salary to the president of the concern.

Our people pay out of their pockets salaries and profits to the large newspaper organizations so large as to stagger the imagination, while our Government, through the Post Office Department, is losing $3,000,000 per year hauling the newspapers of only the concern—namely, the Curtis Publishing Co.

Think of it, reliable information is available to the effect that this very paper with all this Government subsidy gets $10,000 per week for one double-page advertisement, $5,000 per week for single-page advertisements, and similarly large pay for all its advertising space.

The farmers and the average private citizen are being destroyed by these subsidies, exorbitant salaries of private business concerns and an economic system which is slavery of the most vicious type. The common people pay for all this expensive advertising and for all these salaries and subsidies.

I am so disappointed when I realize that a stampede has been caused by the great interest which will probably result in additional burdens on my farmers and other people rather than any sort of real relief.

Why does not Congress solve the farm problem? I have told you how it can be done. Why does not Congress pass some real legislation looking to a solution of the problems which caused the depression, instead of applying only temporary expedients? Loans made by the Government at best only give temporary relief. The farmers need better prices; everybody needs more employment and more business and a larger income.

The course of Congress in ignoring important issues and wasting time on minor matters reminds me of a hunter in a great forest being attacked by hundreds of wild ferocious beasts while he is wasting his ammunition shooting sparrows and jorees.

Why can not we stop, look, listen, take our bearings, and act sanely first on the matters that concern our people most vitally and later on those that are of minor importance. Congress should handle emergency matters, of course, but the real causes of our trouble should be remedied and that without delay.

Mr. Speaker, it is manifestly unfair to consider any legislative proposal without so far as possible taking into account every reason for the measure and its every effect, if enacted into law. No one can fathom to the fullest extent all these causes and effects and yet from the faithful study of them arises the ability to act intelligently. There are evils in our Government and they should be remedied. There are overlappings and duplications and they should be eliminated. Some salaries are too large and should be reduced. There are many unnecessary and even harmful activities which should be abolished with great resultant economies.

Bureaucratic government is sapping the very life out of our Nation and should be opposed in every way possible and reduced to the lowest minimum. And yet I urge with all the earnestness of my soul that a wholesale, ill-considered, and indiscriminate reduction of small Federal salaries will not remedy any of these evils, will not be real economy, and will only add to and perpetuate the present orgy of waste and extravagance. Those who are rolling in wealth—even in this depression—as the result of the evils in our Government, say with great vehemence do not touch the class legislation which enables us to keep one hand in the United States Treasury, but by all means reduce salaries of employees and laboring men and women "down to the most humble employee."

Those who are holding office and rendering no real service because of overlappings and duplications in vicious unnecessary bureaus say do not eliminate us, but cut all salaries, "down to the most humble employee." Those who are getting tremendous profits, rake-offs, commissions, and unreasonable salaries are very strong advocates of an economy program passing them by and cutting the salary of "the most humble employee." Big bankers, corporation officials, and other giants in the financial world who have robbed the common people until the country was plunged into this awful depression are saying, "The way to bring back prosperity is to bleed the people still farther by a sales tax and reduction of the salaries of Government and other employees 'down to the most humble' and turn this money over to us."

Ah, Mr. Speaker, these greedy, conscienceless money holders and hoarders of the Nation, not satisfied with their awful plunder of the farmer, the laborer, and the common people, are the strongest advocates of still further plunder and pillage of the "most humble" citizen.

Let us pause for a few minutes and see just what this Congress is doing. Over the protest of many of us, the first thing this Congress did last December was to pass a foreign-debts moratorium, thus for the present year donating approximately $250,000,000 to the nations of Europe. The same group of international bankers who wanted the foreign-debts moratorium so they could make enormous profits out of their foreign loans and investments are now loudest in their cry that reduction of the salary of "the most humble employee" must be made and a sales tax must be levied to balance the Budget.

But this is not all; the Members of Congress who voted loudest for the foreign-debts moratorium are now loudest in their advocacy of a sales tax and a salary reduction to be saddled on the "most humble employee" to replace the money given to European nations last December.

Listen while I tell more of the plot: The same international bankers and multimillionaires who made their millions out of foreign loans and investments and inveigled the United States into moratoriums and cancellations of practically all our foreign debts, so they—these financial sharks—could collect their profits and debts, also for selfish purposes equally as base and vile. They seduced the Congress into passing the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act making available as loans—on paper so insecure as to constitute a gift to these bankers—enough of the people's money to pay off the entire amount of money now admitted to be due as adjusted compensation to all the American veterans of the World War.

And yet the greatest opposition to payment of the soldiers' bonus, the greatest clamor for the sales tax and the greatest demand for reduction of salaries "down to the most humble employee" come from these international bankers and their cohorts. With their banks bulging with fraudulently obtained money, with full knowledge that they are the cause of the larger part, if not all, of the greatest and most severe financial suffering this country ever saw and with their hands dripping with innocent blood of millions of men, women, and children, these men of wealth make every possible maneuver to get more money and more political power.

Mr. Speaker, if this so-called economy bill had all stayed intact and all the reductions of salaries taken place as therein provided, the amount thus taken from all the Federal employees would only equal what the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act sponsors here in Congress provided should, in effect, be donated to only one of these big international banking concerns, it would only equal one-half what these sponsors desired should be handed to one big banking concern. All this so-called economy, if carried to its fullest extent, would only squeeze out of the small Federal employees a little more than one-third of what Congress graciously gave to the foreign nations as a Christmas present last December. I said this was given to the foreign countries, I am in error about this, it was practically all given to the international bankers, for they got it and more in ill-earned profits, bonuses, and commissions out of the foreign countries and from worthless foreign and other valueless securities unloaded by these New York bankers on innocent people and small banks in this country.

Another interesting fact is that practically every Member of Congress who sponsored the foreign-debts moratorium and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act are now vigorously supporting the sales tax and salary reductions "down to the most humble employee."

It is millions and billions of money for foreign nations, for international bankers, and great corporations, but none to pay a just debt due the veterans of the World War and none for the poorest of the poor and "the humblest employee" and none for the farmer whose home is being sold by foreclosure.

As has always been the case, the farmer, the laborer, and the poor man must bear all the burden. They must pay a sales tax or other equally vicious tax and suffer salary reduction, if they have a salary; and toil and sell below the cost of production if they have a farm or can rent one. They must do all this, it is contended, to balance the Budget, which was gotten out of balance by the very crowd of financial pirates who are now trying to whip these people of the farm, store, shop, and office into balancing the Budget.

It is getting time for Congress to begin helping the common beople balance their budgets, rather than increase their burdens so they can not balance them.

On several occasions during these debates Members of the House have urged that everyone at this time should be willing to make a sacrifice by paying additional taxes or by selling farm products below the cost of production or by suffering salary reductions even if one is least of "the most humble employees."

Mr. Speaker, I am sure that every patriotic citizen not only of my district but of the whole Nation would gladly sacrifice to the limit in behalf of his or her Nation, but many are not willing to sacrifice themselves and their loved ones on an altar of gold or worship at the feet of the Wall Street interest, as a part and parcel of an endless servitude to the international bankers. I have not hesitated to announce myself as opposed to a reduction of the lower salaries or wages of the Federal employees or other employees. I have already voted for and will continue to vote for a reduction of the larger salaries including those of Members of Congress. I realize that it would be dangerous to reduce salaries of Members of Congress so low until no one but the very rich could afford to come here and pay the expenses of holding the office and running every two years for reelection. The people would become slaves indeed if Congress should become a rich man's club. But during this depression I feel all Members of Congress can afford to take a salary cut, and I will go as far as anyone in Congress or out in this respect. I have already voted and will continue to vote to cut my salary and my mileage, clerk hire, and stationery allowance. But I repeat I am opposed to slashing the lower salaries of Federal and other employees, not only because this is sought to be done to raise money to be wasted as the result of foreign-debt moratoriums, loans to great corporations, unnecessary extravagance, past and future but because of certain other reasons.

The wholesale reduction of salaries means a further fall of the price of farm products. Never in the history of the world has the price of farm products in any country gone up while the price of labor was going down. Reductions of lower or smaller salaries or wages means an additional pressure on the top of the price of farm products and will shove them farther down and hold them down until the pressure is removed. The slashing of the lower salaries will not cause my people to get one cent more for their products, but on the contrary will have a tendency to cause them to get less.

I know that even if the Army was called out and all employees of the Government were forced to work for only bread and water for food and a tent for shelter, the country would be no better off and would lose the helpful influence of the purchasing power of these employees. The argument would be made at once that since wages are now low, salaries meager, and many are out of employment, the prices of farm products must be dragged lower and yet lower.

This country owes billions of dollars of indebtedness made when prices of everything were high. The people can never pay all these high-price debts with low-price farm products and low-price labor. The prices of farm products must be elevated to where they were when the farmer made his debts or the farmer will simply continue to lose out and the depression will remain.

Ah! Mr. Speaker, there is method in the madness of the Wall Street interests and their friends in Congress. Not a word was said about the condition of the Treasury or the balancing of the Budget when the big financial interests sought the foreign-debt moratorium, or to put over the Reconstruction Finance Corporation steal, or to provide for the purchase of Federal land bank stock by the Government for the bankers, but the cry of Treasury deficit and Budget balancing became loud and continuous when it was suggested that something be done for the farmer, to stop the foreclosure orgy or to help the unemployment situation.

It was at once made known that these were to get no help and that a determined effort was to be made under the shout of Treasury deficit and the whip crack of Budget balancing not only to refuse help to the farmer, the laborer, and the private independent citizen but to squaeeze out of them the very money which had so lavishly been provided for foreign nations, international bankers, and other financial pirates of the Nation.

Mr. Speaker, one of the Members of this body has seen proper to say "There is less courage in the American Congress to-day than has been the case since the formation of the Government."

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the gentleman is trying to cover a lot of territory. It may be, though, that he will be able to do so, at least to his own satisfaction, since he is probably willing to admit that there is at least one courageous Member of the House and that he is that particular fellow.

Since I came to think fully about the matter, I find that the gentleman is probably mistaken. I find that the gentleman voted with the Democratic and Republican majority of this House in putting over the foreign-debts-moratorium robbery, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation steal, and the Federal land-bank stock grab, and voted with and helped the majority in blocking and killing the only proposal to come on the floor during this Congress to grant a moratorium to the farmers or a group of farmers.

The gentleman has been with the majority of Democrats and Republicans that has not offered a single worth-while proposal to solve either the marketing problem for the farmer, or the vitally important transportation problem, or the unemployment problem of the laboring man, or the depression problem of such great interest to us all. The gentleman has also been with the majority that has prevented the taking up for enactment of any and all measures looking to the proper permanent solution of any of these great questions.

Now, since the gentleman has been with the victorious Democratic and Republican majority in all these contests, it is only fair to assume that he thinks his own crowd is courageous and therefore that the real cowards are very much in the minority.

We find that the gentleman was only in the minority when in an effort to raise money to pay for the previous sins of the majority here, he tried to help fasten a Federal sales tax on the backs of the American people, when he attempted to destroy Federal aid for vocational education, and when he attempted to aid and abet in putting over certain other equally vicious measures.

It is really a pity for a Member to be so unfortunate as to be always with the majority when the majority is wrong and always with the minority when the minority is wrong.

It is time for him to get mad, but he ought not to blame other folks for his own errors. If anyone has any doubt about this particular gentleman being really mad, listen to this. He accuses some Members of "flagrant betrayal of the rights of the people closely approaching downright dishonesty."

Mr. Speaker, the drunkest man in the crowd always thinks that everybody else is drunk, and the most guilty man thinks that everybody else is a criminal.

Well, those of us who have conscienciously differed from the gentleman on these various matters are willing to let the voters determine to whom this accusation of his should apply.

The gentleman also mentions the power of "organized minorities." Well, he probably knows what he is talking about this time.

Some, if not all, of the vicious measures which have been attempted at this Congress were started and kept going by very small organized minorities, consisting of only two or three men, who traveled only the distance from Wall Street, New York, to Washington, D. C.

And now some of us are branded as cowards because we are not willing to join in with those who take directions from Wall Street and help them in this awful, murderous, traitorous program of delivering our fellow man into slavery and our Nation into chaos and destruction. It may take a certain kind of bravery to follow the Wall Street gang of financial pirates. Those who call such as this patriotism are welcome to their own self-praise. I realize that I oft-times commit error. I am human. I have but one conscience; and when I follow it, I am doing my best and performing my duty to the fullest extent of my capacity.

Mr. Speaker, to my mind more money must be put into circulation and not less. More and better wages must be paid and not less. The farmer must get more for his products, not less. There must be less Government bureaus and more efficient service and not more commissions, more bureaus, and more parasitic, useless, high-salaried bureau chiefs. There should be less taxes on the people and not more. By the way, taxes are necessary to pay the expense of government. Better a thousand times reasonable taxes and real government than no taxes and no government or no taxes and bad government.

My farmers would much prefer to pay heavy taxes if the money was used to usher in a period of prosperity and happiness for them and theirs. The question is whether or not the people are getting value received for their taxes. At present they are not able to pay their taxes, and the average citizen is getting worse than nothing in return. The Federal tax is not hurting the average citizen of small means as much as the State, county, and city tax. All tax sales are for these and not for Federal taxes. This, though, furnishes no reason for us here to waste Federal funds. The sales tax, though, would be different. It would reach every citizen everywhere, taking from the poorest of the poor and from all. I am bitterly opposed to a Federal sales tax. If levied at al, it should be by the States for State purposes and in lieu of taxes on property for home purposes, which I feel should carry a reasonable exemption.

This leads me to my idea of a farm-relief program which I have heretofore discussed, but which I will not take up just now. I will, though, discuss it again in the near future.

In this connection may I say I feel and contend that it is not necessary or best at this time to levy additional taxes or make cuts in smaller salaries to balance the Budget. Actual current expenses of the Government should be paid by taxes, tariffs, and so forth, but emergency expenditures such as got the Budget out of balance should be handled by a long-term bond issue to be paid when the country is more prosperous. This would bring more money into circulation, whereas the plan now sought to be put into effect will have the opposite result. In talking along these lines one naturally comes to the question of whether or not the balance of the adjusted compensation due the veterans of the World War should be paid. It therefore may not be amiss for me at this time to say a few words on this subject.

Mr. Speaker, it is admitted by all that the balance of adjusted compensation due the veterans of the World War is a debt. No one can honestly contend that the amount heretofore paid and to be paid is too large, that it was not honestly and honorably earned, or that it is not due for value received. Congress has by solemn act heretofore determined that this debt is just, true, due, and unpaid. The same Congress has determined this debt to be due that determined that these veterans owed their service and their lives, if need be, to their country, and that these veterans must pay in full their obligation to their country. Now that the service has been rendered and performed in full by these veterans, this same Congress is delaying the payment of the debt so adjudicated to be due for the services so demanded and so received.

This adjusted compensation is as much due these veterans as are the salaries that are being paid to the thousands of Government employees throughout the land. This money is more due than the salary of the President or the salaries of Members of Congress or United States Senators. We sought our positions of ease at a good salary while the soldier was forced to fight whether he wanted to or not, with all the hardships and risk of war, at a salary—adjusted compensation included—which is little more than a mere gesture. Why should not this debt be paid at once?

Can the United States pay its obligations? If not, why not? Why refuse payment of this debt to the veterans with one hand and with the other hand pay the debts due all other people? Why refuse the veterans of our Nation with one hand and with the other hand donate many, many times as much money to the nations of Europe to pay their veterans and to prepare for future wars into which we may be drawn or which may be declared and waged against us?

Why should this very Congress make arrangements through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act to loan enough to the big corporations to pay the balance due the World War veterans, and yet refuse this just debt admitted to be due these veterans? Why should this $2,000,000,000 be loaned on security which no banker wants and on which the Government will probably lose its money, rather than pay it to these veterans in full settlement of money due them, which must be paid some day and, therefore, can not be lost by the Government now paying these just obligations?

I repeat, and repeat again, why loan this money to the very gang of multimillionaires who made their millions during the World War out of the suffering of these veterans, their families and friends, rather than pay it to the men and women who did the suffering incident to the war?

Why endeavor to raise this $2,000,000,000 by taxing the poorest of the poor and making loans—that amount to outright donations—to the Wall street interests, to be further hoarded and put out of circulation, rather than raise this same amount of money by a bond issue and pay these veterans, thus putting every cent of this money into circulation? The United States can either pay its debts or it can not pay them. If our Nation is able to build and equip various magnificient public buildings here in Washington which are now in course of construction, with all the park improvements, streets, bridges, roadways, and lavish expenditures that are taking place on every hand, the Government is able to pay these veterans their hard-earned compensation to keep them and their loved ones alive.

Surely if the Government is able to tear down the Post Office Department building here and thus destroy one of the most useful, valuable, and beautiful buildings in the world, simply and only because some group of Federal appointees doesn't like its looks quite as well as they do some other building to be built in its place at enormous cost to the taxpayers, then the measly sum due each of these veterans can be paid to drive the wolf of hunger and want from their doors.

I repeat, the same amount of money that has been authorized to be loaned to the big corporations, in $100,000,000 items to a single corporation, is sufficient to pay in full the adjusted compensation to the World War veterans.

How can anyone knowing of all the suffering which these veterans and their people have endured, say, "The Government is able to pay all else but not you; the Government is able to give to foreign nations many times the amount of your compensation and even continue to grant foreign-debt moratoriums at the annual cost of $250,000,000 for this year alone, but can not pay the veterans their just claim; and that the Government can actually raise enough money to pay the veterans in full, but must loan it on unsecured and worthless paper to the House of Morgan and other Wall Street interests and are determined not to pay these veterans what is due them and instead let want, starvation, and death overtake and destroy those who fought and suffered and sacrificed that we might live and our Nation might endure?" This course may be pursued by some but in my heart I can not approve it and I shall in every way possible oppose it.

I would not at all favor raising the money to pay these veterans if it had to be taxed out of the poorest of the poor, during this very year. If this money had to be taxed out of the veterans themselves, and out of their fathers and mothers, brothers and sisters, and out of the taxpayers generally, then it might be urged that very little good would come to the country from this payment, but this is not the case.

Regardless of what may be said about raising this money by the various schemes that have been suggested, all who have closely studied the matter must admit that every cent needed to pay the veterans can be raised at once by a bond issue without impairment to the credit of the Nation. What would be the result? Money that is now in hiding in safety-deposit boxes and elsewhere and not in circulation would go into these bonds, to be used to pay these veterans and by them to be used for themselves and their families, thus going into circulation and again entering upon its mission of service to all mankind.

The United States Government, instead of owing this amount of money to the veterans, would owe the same amount to those whose money is now idle. The bond purchaser would be better off, for he would be getting interest on money now idle. The Government would owe the same amount to the bond purchasers it now owes to the veterans. The veteran would receive the money which he has earned, which is due him, and which he needs. This money would not only give the veteran a new lease on life but it would at once go into circulation, helping everybody everywhere.

Mr. Speaker, truly "the love of money is the root of all evil," and is the real cause of the present financial depression. The love of money has brought about the numerous vicious laws giving the money-mad monopolies a strangle hold on the throats of the laborer, the farmer, and the masses of American citizens. All these years the love of money has kept the farmer from getting a square deal, forced him to carry not only his own burden but the burden of all others, brought about an orgy of extravagance, gambling, and riotous criminal manipulations of human rights, caused the common people to be robbed of their all, and plunged our Nation and the world in the greatest panic of all time.

This depression will never be permanently relieved unless and until its causes are forever removed. This Nation can never again be prosperous without a contented citizenry of home owners in the smaller cities and especially in the country. With this, prosperity would return and remain forever. Community owned and controlled banks would reopen in the small towns and cities, business would revive and this Government would become stronger and more permanent as the years come and go.

To my mind we are at the parting of the ways. There is a right way and a wrong way. We have really been traveling the wrong way, and yet we can retrace our course and take the right way if we will act before it is too late. The decision must be made, and now. We must reestablish the common people in control of their own affairs and bring prosperity out of this wreckage and chaos, or suffer the inevitable downfall of our Government. There can be no abiding prosperity without the proper solution of the farm problem, the labor problem, the transportation problem, and other economic questions affecting the very lives of our people.

Let us quit taking up all our time with flimsy temporary palliatives. Let us find the real causes of the trouble and work day and night to overcome them. This and nothing else, in a legislative way, is our solemn duty.

OUR FOREIGN POLICY

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Mr. Speaker, it is the fashion of the supporters of the present American foreign policy to take a separate and apart, do-nothing attitude, to glorify such an attitude as the "American tradition," and to seek to justify it as a wise and prudent course on the ground that any more positive and vigorous policy, whether pursued in concert with other nations or pursued alone, would be dangerous and lead us into war.

One of the by-products of this attitude always dragged into the discussion is the assumption that in following any other course our boys will be dragged onto some foreign battlefields to settle foreign quarrels. To say that a more vigorous attitude would be contrary to American tradition and policy, and to supplement it with the assumption our boys would be sent to fight in foreign fields, is expected to make the argument unanswerable.

It is assumed that because in the flintlock age a policy of "refraining from permanent alliances with particular nations" had its ample justification in experience, such aloofness must be our position to-day. It was good for our fathers and therefore is good for us. This is the argument of the blind leading the blind. When the spaces of the earth were thinly settled and the means of communication of the ox-cart kind, and when there existed a considerable economic self-sufficiency for each nation, such an attitude might well be justified, as it was for us 100 years ago. But in an age of far-reaching economic interdependence between nations, in an age of indemnities, international debts, lethal gas, of aviation and submarines, the combustible materials of international life are brought too close together to make the "let-alone" and "do-nothing" policy a safe one.

Some sniper of unbalanced mind in the international community, some red with his torch, may set them off. The hoary American tradition becomes then about as sure a test of wisdom as that of the man who found that if he lived through the month of March he lived the rest of the year. Yet this attitude is American statesmanship to-day. It would appear, however, that those who are the spokesmen of the "do-nothing" policy have not been and are not easy in their conscience. They recognize that a negative attitude that can not meet positive international requirements is subject to criticism on that account. It was this recognition on our part, this uneasy sense of something missing if we are to keep pace with national aspiration for sharing in the peace program, that led to the drafting and signing of the pact of Paris, renouncing war and pledging the signatories thereto to the use of pacific means for the settlement of international disputes.

And now since the Sino-Japanese affair it is, in turn, the realization of the inadequacy of the pact of Paris without sanctions that has prompted the State Department to set up as a new departure in international law the new formula that this Government will not recognize the legality of any situation, treaty, or agreement brought about by force. This attitude has been followed by like declaration on the part of the League of Nations. But will it accomplish anything? Our Secretary of State, Mr. Stimson, says it will. He says:

> It will effectively bar the legality hereafter of any title or right shown to be obtained by pressure or treaty violation.

The Acting Secretary of State, Hon. William R. Castle, jr., says of it in a recent address delivered by him for the general conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, May 6, that it—

> Has put teeth in the pact of Paris and has done it in a way which avoids the use of force. * * * No such nation [predatory nation] in the future will be permitted to enjoy the fruits of its dishonest attack on the peace structure of society.

This is a bold prophecy made by the Acting Secretary of State. It is a much stronger claim of merit than any made by Secretary Stimson. The latter claims only that it will effectively bar the legality of any title shown to be obtained by pressure or treaty violation. Mr. Castle claims that it will bar the enjoyment of the fruits of predatory action. These two claims are very far apart. Will Mr. Castle's prophecy prove true? Has it yet proved true in Manchuria? Is not Japan in full possession of the fruits of its attack on the peace structure of society? Japan signed the pact of Paris, and Japan has broken faith both with us and the world with respect to Manchuria. Yet Japan is apparently in possession of Manchuria to stay. Perhaps it will be said that it is too early to come to conclusions as to Japan's control in Manchuria, or, using the language of Mr. Castle, as to Japan's enjoyment of "the fruits of its attack on the peace structure of society." That may possibly be true; perhaps it is too early to judge. But I venture the prediction that Japan is in Manchuria to stay. Perhaps there is a moral law of compensations which in the course of ages will ultimately work retribution on Japan, but it is not apparent to-day.

I am inclined to believe that Secretary Stimson has his doubts about the effectiveness of his proposal from the cautious claims he makes for it. Acting Secretary Castle has prophesied that the enjoyment of the fruits of dishonesty will be barred. Secretary Stimson is much more cautious. He confines himself to the legality of title. Acting Secretary Castle speaks of the enjoyment of the fruits of attack. The colored boy who likes watermelons may never get title to the watermelons he purloins from his neighbor's garden, but neither will he be barred from the enjoyment of the fruits of his dishonesty by any caveat made against stealing. Legality of title in such a situation means nothing unless it includes the power of a superior agency to judge the rightfulness of possession and to punish, if necessary. And the creation of such an agency is what we of America scorn to attempt. We say it is against our national tradition and policy.

With every desire to find encouragement in the new policy presented by Secretary Stimson, with every wish that as a moral sanction it may prove effective, I can not see in it anything but a plausible, fine-appearing mantle to cover the poverty of a timid, fearsome policy. It represents drift, and the best than can be said of it is that it represents drift in the right direction.

ECONOMY

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD by including a copy of a letter which I wrote in answer to one on the subject of economy.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following letter written by me upon the subject of economy:

MAY 3, 1932.

Mr. E. B. MACNAUGHTON,
Vice President the First National Bank, Portland, Oreg.

DEAR MR. MACNAUGHTON: I have your letter of April 27, and, while contrary to popular belief, we are extremely busy and crowded for time, yet I feel that you are entitled to a more extended communication than a mere acknowledgment, because I think you are laboring under misinformation which has been industriously disseminated by interests apparently seeking to discredit the Congress and divert the attention of the rank and file of the American people away from some of the real causes of national distress.

My knowledge of your standing and character is such that I know you are seriously concerned and your interest in this matter is a sincere and patriotic one, and I gather from your communication that probably you are a stockholder in one or both of the business institutions mentioned, namely, the Du Pont Co. and the Standard Oil Co. of California, and I presume you received a letter from the former company similar to the one which various Members of Congress in both branches have caused to be placed in the RECORD as a monumental illustration of misleading propaganda.

This propaganda is in line with the course pursued by international bankers who dumped worthless foreign securities on unsuspecting citizens of this country as well as made loans in foreign countries and then joined with resident foreign manufacturers in a campaign against our system of protection to American producers and American laborers for the purpose of opening our markets up to cheap labor produced commodities of foreign countries to enable them to repay these loans at the expense of our own people and also for the additional purpose of diverting the attention of the people from their selfish manipulations, and the attitude of these people has been: "Look at governmental extravagance, look at congressional mismanagement, look at high salaries, look at high taxes, look at the tariff, but for God's sake, don't look at us."

While the Congress of the United States is doing its best to protect the business of the country and maintain the confidence of the people in our business institutions, these people are constantly inveighing against the Congress and against the Government, and if capitalism in this country is abolished and this Nation takes up the bloody road to Moscow, it will not be through organized "reds" and communists, but it will be due in a large measure to those with swollen fortunes who have joined hands with the "reds" in an effort to destroy the confidence of our people in their Government.

On April 30 Hon. PHIL SWING caused a copy of this letter to be placed in the RECORD, and made some remarks on the floor concerning the same, and called attention to the fact that the Budget, to begin with, was cut more than $350,000,000 under last year's expenses and that the House Appropriations Committee cut the appropriations 5 per cent in addition to the Budget cut and that the Senate made an additional cut of 10 per cent, which in some particulars, I fear, will work hardships upon some of the departments of the Government. I am inclosing you the remarks made by Mr. SWING, with the accompanying letter of the Du Pont Co.; also, on yesterday Mr. SWING made some additional remarks on the subject, and included in the RECORD a copy of memorandum from Mr. Roop, the Director of the Budget, concerning the comparison made in the Du Pont letter between the expenditures of the fiscal year 1927 and the fiscal year 1932. I am also inclosing you pages from the RECORD, showing this letter from the Bureau of the Budget, and in addition I am inclosing you an address delivered by David Lawrence, editor of the United States Daily and one of the most intelligent observers of governmental affairs in the country.

I am merely submitting these to you and calling your attention to the same for the reason that I know that a great deal of misinformation is being spread abroad in the land and many institutions would be pleased to have the country look in some other direction. So far as I am concerned, I believe in the strictest economy in governmental expenditures that is possible, and we all realize that there is more or less waste and extravagance in all governmental institutions from the small municipalities on up through the State and to the Federal Government, and I realize that when the national income is being reduced that expenditures must be curtailed and that the tax burden should be made as light as possible; but the Congress is constantly called upon by the people for various appropriations, and this is particularly true in our own State, and the people expect us to obtain appropriations to aid in the development of our State, due to the fact that we are a small State in population and that more than 50 per cent of the land is in governmental ownership, and we are blamed and condemned if we fail to secure the appropriations for our State.

We might strike from the appropriation list the one providing for post-office facilities of the city of Portland, but none would want that. We might strike from the list appropriations for rivers and harbors development and reclamation development, but none of our people want this done. The Congress has been called upon this session to save the banking systems of the country and their many millions of depositors, and conservative business men of outstanding prominence have stated that if the Congress had not come to the rescue and provided for the Refinancing Corporation that probably two-thirds of the banks in the United States would have failed before the year is over, and with this statement I am in agreement. The appropriation of these large sums of money sounds big, and they are enormous, but the Congress is composed of men who are trying to do their duty by the country and protect and save the country's institutions.

Concerning the proposed cuts in the small salaries of the wage earners of the Government, I have to say that I did not vote for the reduction of employees' salaries above $1,200 per year. I did vote for a cut above $2,500, and I did that with considerable hesitation, for the simple reason that about 75 per cent of Federal employees receive an average of $1,440 per year, and I do not believe that they should bear a big part of the burden that has been brought on the country through the misfortunes of war and thus relieve from the burden some of the great profiteers who are spreading the propaganda and who grew rich by coining blood and tears into money. Furthermore, reduction in wages and reduction in purchasing power, as you well know, will not help to restore prosperity.

The President of the United States was not in favor of reducing these small Federal employees' salaries, because he knew that on an average they were low and that if we were not careful we would only add to the long line of unemployment, and all that he recommended was the furlough plan, which I, together with the majority of the Republican Members, supported when the minimum was placed at $2,000.

I assure you that I was glad to have your letter and to know your interest in the situation and trust that I have made the situation a little clearer to you and will be glad to have your views at any time.

Sincerely yours,

ROBERT R. BUTLER.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, severe criticism has developed against the Interstate Commerce Commission. For some time past such criticism was a mere smoldering of discontented but interested persons. This smoldering has become a jet of flaming condemnation against it. Railroads, bondholders, banks, publicists, economists, have raised a hue and cry that must sooner or later reach the Congress.

The commission, I believe, went pretty far in its laying heavy structures upon the application of the Missouri Pacific Railroad to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to assume partially the road's loan to the banks. For this the commission was properly rebuked by the press generally.

It is difficult to understand the commission's recent decision in the case of the St. Louis-San Francisco Railroad, when it said the road could borrow from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, but before any advance is made the road would have to submit a plan to effect substantial reduction in its fixed interest charges within 60 days. To do this in 60 days is impossible. Further, it is rather late for the commission to decrease the road's fixed charges when it has all along encouraged and approved substantially the road's fixed charges. The recent action of the commission rather delays than furthers strengthening railway credit through Reconstruction Finance Corporation or bank loans to railroads. The commission can easily undo the good the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is doing by undermining public confidence in the roads by its continued captious criticism.

The commission was mandated by Congress in 1920 to see to it that the railroads earned sufficient income. Five and three-quarters per cent was considered a fair return on investment. By many very unjust and unfair decisions the commission has made such return on investment utterly impossible.

Small wonder, therefore, we read frequently, only too frequently, condemnation of the commission of the type of the following:

[Reprint from the Wall Street Journal, December 16, 1931]

REGULATION PLUS TAXATION

EDITOR THE WALL STREET JOURNAL:

It is a self-evident fact if a nation is prosperous and is to continue so the government must conserve and safeguard the wealth of its citizens; when there is world-wide depression there must be causes which have produced such an abnormal situation in the United States.

Upon searching for fundamental facts we find that politics has given us legislation based on propaganda—cant, hypocrisy, and platitude—and our present conditions, the result.

In this country, after an experience of 50 years of the control of public street railways by State and city authorities, the regulations have been such that practically all have passed through bankruptcy. Owing to the hue and cry of over 40 years ago, the National Government embarked upon a campaign of Federal regulation authorized by Congress by which $25,000,000,000 worth of property is now in the absolute control of 11 men, who rely on their undermen to report what they should do; their dictates as laid down must be obeyed by the railroads; this commission tells them what they must do and what they can not do; in fact, tells them everything except how to earn the money to pay a return on bonds and stocks issued under the authority of the Interstate Commerce Commission. The railroads are supposed to pay taxes to every county, State, city, and town and a percentage of their profits to the United States Government; and the Interstate Commerce Commission is supposed to give them a fair return of 5¾ per cent on their property. This the Interstate Commerce Commission has never done, as under the law the members of this commission are not responsible to anyone for their action. In spite of this absolutely impossible situation, Congress in its wisdom inserted in the transportation act the recapture clause, which was the greatest piece of racketeering ever practiced in the United States. The railroads are expected to carry out the various orders issued by the Interstate Commerce Commission, but it does not supply them with the money needed so to do. What is the legal or moral responsibility of the Interstate Commerce Commission when it compels railroads to issue common stock at a price that they set; is it not a moral guaranty that the investor will receive a minimum rate of 5¾ per cent on his investment? But the investor knows now that the Interstate Commerce Commission has played a game.

The Interstate Commerce Commission has been, is, and continues to be a menace to the prosperity of this country; "the people's welfare" and "the people's interest" have simply been the propaganda of the loud-mouthed against a major industry of the United States, and the harassing of the railroads has now resulted in unemployment; the railroads have been compelled to discharge hundreds of thousands of men, the industries supplying the railroads are practically shut down; this in conjunction with the loss of railroad employment has caused a lack of business in every town where railroads have their shops or where railroad employees live, as well as where the materials used by railroads are manufactured. The Interstate Commerce Commission is aided in crowding the railroads by State commissions. The State of California, the home of antirailroad propaganda, through its supreme court, ordered three railroads to obey the order of the State railroad commission to build a $10,000,000 terminal in Los Angeles but forgot to tell the railroads where to obtain the money. Such power is beyond the sane thought of man. For years the railroads have received from Government nothing of material benefit, but, instead, orders for excessive expenditures, not the least of which has been the payment by the railroads of a major part of the expense to eliminate grade crossings, on the theory that new streets opened gave a railroad more business. How true this theory is is self-evident. The power to assess is the power to oppress; the power to regulate is the power to strangle; regulation plus taxation equals ruination.

WILLIAM I. WALTER.

NEW YORK, December 12, 1931.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Calendar Wednesday business in order to-morrow be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, if Calendar Wednesday business is dispensed with to-morrow we will go ahead with the War Department appropriation bill?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Speaker, I understood last night that a tentative agreement was reached with the leadership not to dispense with Calendar Wednesday business to-morrow. Other Members have so understood, and have made their plans accordingly. I have just learned of some exercises on Thursday in which a very large proportion of the membership is interested, and while I regret the necessity, I shall feel constrained to object at this time, and I do object.

The SPEAKER. Will the House permit the Chair to make a statement in the way of a suggestion? It is desirable to pass this bill, if possible, this week. A large number of gentlemen have indicated a desire to attend certain exercises at Alexandria, Va., on Thursday. If we could consider the Army bill to-morrow and could have an understanding or a gentleman's agreement that we would have general debate only on Thursday, and a lot of gentlemen desire time in general debate; and if we could get through with the Army bill by Friday night, the Chair thinks it would be very agreeable to all concerned, because on Saturday the Chair thinks the private calendar is entitled to consideration. We have not had a Private Calendar on Saturday since the new rule was adopted, and the thought occurred to the Chair that if we could pass the Army bill after considering it on Wednesday and Friday, we might have general debate all day Thursday with a gentleman's agreement that no point of no quorum would be made.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, on what is there going to be general debate?

The SPEAKER. On the President's message that we just referred to the Committee of the Whole, or on anything the Members may want. As a matter of fact, we could go into the Committee of the Whole to consider the President's message which was delivered in December last, as it is still pending. I do not know whether this suggestion of the Chair is agreeable to the Members or not.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, will there be any veto message laid before the House on Thursday that the Chair knows about?

The SPEAKER. I could not possibly tell the gentleman what veto message may come to the House.

Mr. TILSON. I did not know but that there might be a message on the Speaker's desk.

The SPEAKER. If any such message comes on Thursday, undoubtedly it could be considered on Friday, and the Chair would undertake to protect the membership in that situation.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Speaker, it grieves me very much to insist upon my objection, but in line with an agreement with one of my colleagues, I object.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, objection would not prevent dispensing with Calendar Wednesday business upon motion made to-morrow or even to-night.

The SPEAKER. No; under the rule Calendar Wednesday business can be dispensed with by a two-thirds vote.

REVENUE AND TAXATION

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, from the Committee on Finance I submit the majority report on the bill (H. R. 10236) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes, known as the revenue bill (Rept. No. 665). I will say to the Senate that in a very few moments there will be copies of the report on the desks of Senators so they will have it to look over during the day or this evening. Tomorrow, as soon as I can obtain the floor, I shall address the Senate on the bill, explaining in detail just what it accomplishes.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] has just filed a report from the Finance Committee on the revenue bill. Several members of that committee constituting a minority are desirous of filing, and now ask permission to file, the views of the minority, and ask also for authority to have the views of the minority printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The views of the minority of the Committee on Finance on the revenue bill were subsequently submitted by Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts and ordered to be printed as part 2 of Report No. 665.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

BUSINESS OF THE SESSION

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the importance and the urgency of the subject in mind are the justification for my taking the floor to make a brief statement.

The greatest fear that has gripped this country is that of unemployment, actual or apprehended. It has chilled every heart and carries back through the merchant, the manufacturer, the farmer, and the producer of other raw materials. Many suggestions for constructive measures have been made, some of them by Senators who have devoted much more study to the subject than I have been able to do. Suggestions have also been made by others who are not Members of the Congress. It is with a full consciousness of the limitations on my own knowledge that I venture to suggest in general terms some principles and measures which it is hoped will be given consideration and regarded as helpful in working out the problems to which the suggestions relate.

This is a crisis, and as in a war crisis we necessarily classify worthy economic projects in two groups: First, those which are indispensable and permit immediate action; second, other advantageous and helpful measures which can not be quickly or immediately formulated and carried into effect.

The indispensable measures, as I view them, are a balanced Budget and methods to get actual buying power into the hands of consumers. A government which can not or will not pay the bulk of its annual expenses out of revenues must soon come to the end of its borrowing capacity. There is only one course left, namely, by one means or another to issue money of doubtful value. Fear chills the hearts of our people because of the possibility of that now, and we shall go farther down into the depths unless expenses and receipts are brought together. The fear that this will not be done nullifies every plan enacted or proposed.

It is not practicable to provide out of revenues this year precisely all expenses contemplated by the appropriations which probably must be made. It is indispensable to take steps that will bring the Budget into approximate balance and appeal to every reasonable and informed man to aid in bringing about a complete balance next year. When this is done, and the honesty of our money and fiscal policy is established and maintained in the eyes of all the world, there will be no necessity to resort to questionable processes for expanding the currency or for any other form of fiscal tinkering. Money will flow here out of retreat from all parts of the world and out of hiding into business from all sections of the country, buying will be resumed, and we shall have reached the end of two and a half years of uninterrupted deflation. Based on these considerations, the following suggestions are respectfully submitted:

Establish and maintain the public credit beyond peradventure by a frank and unequivocal statement of probable revenues and proposed expenditures, not omitting from the latter items merely deferred. This information is essential to the reestablishment of confidence in the fiscal affairs of this Government.

Proceed by taxation and equitable reduction of Government costs to establish a sound relation between revenues and appropriations. I think we all realize the practical difficulties that inhere in this suggestion, but I also think there is no substantial disagreement as to the purpose to be accomplished. Inevitably and unavoidably differences have arisen over the method and means by which this end is to be obtained, and in working out this first great problem of satisfying the public that the United States purposes to maintain a proper proportion between its revenues and its expenditures we are called upon to exercise great patience and to use the utmost diligence.

If the Budget be balanced so that there is renewed confidence in the Government's monetary and fiscal policy, there will be little difficulty in reviving and expanding the actual buying power of consumers. Increased buying power may be brought about by supplying the immediate and pressing necessities of the unemployed and by a sound and well-considered program for the construction of self-liquidating projects.

It is my humble suggestion that before the present session ends there should be made available through the sale of Government bonds at least $300,000,000 to be advanced to the States and muicipalities in relief of suffering caused by unemployment. To be somewhat specific as to the measure, the bill before the Senate introduced by the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER], reported from the Committee on Manufactures, which has exhausted much effort in studying the subject, may be taken as a basis for this feature of the suggested program.

It will be recalled that earlier in the session a bill was presented to the Senate looking to the appropriation of $375,000,000 for the purposes now being discussed, and that all legislation on the subject failed because of a difference in opinion between those who were proposing legislation, one group suggesting and urging that the appropriation should be made without provision for return to the Treasury, the other group suggesting and insisting that it would be well and advisable to use the fund through local agencies and to provide for reimbursement of the Federal Treasury.

Whatever may be the conclusion of the Congress as to the right method to pursue, I believe the time has arrived when action should be taken by the Federal Government. We have all hoped, and some of us have believed, that conditions would improve and that the improvement would be reflected in a diminution of unemployment in this Nation. The information that reaches me is that notwithstanding the very effective efforts that have been made to stimulate employment by certain notable organizations unemployment is increasing rather than diminishing. We speak of adjourning the Congress, if possible, on the 10th of June. It is with the thought that some action on this subject should be taken before the Congress adjourns that I am prompted to make the remarks now being submitted.

The Government, in my opinion, should receive assurance of repayment such as may be obtainable, including State and municipal securities where they are available, and deductions may be made, as proposed in the Wagner bill, when necessary, from future allotments of Federal aid. I know that this phase of the question may provoke difference of opinion, but it seems to me that at this stage it is sound and wise to make the advances to the State and municipal authorities with such arrangements as may be fairly obtained for reimbursement.

Reference was made a moment ago to the effective efforts of certain organizations to stimulate employment. One can not in that connection fail to think of the employment committee of the American Legion. Its goal has been to procure work for a million of the unemployed, and so ably and effectively has the task been carried on that the entire project is well on its way toward accomplishment. While I have no authority to speak for the American Legion or its employment committee I am informed, as other Senators are informed, that a study is being made of this subject by a committee of the Legion and by the American Federation of Labor, and that ample self-liquidating projects can be found or initiated to provide employment for a large number of people and to consume such a fund as at this time it may seem wise to provide.

I do not feel under present and prospective conditions that the mere carrying forward of a construction program will meet the full demands of the situation. There are many thousands of citizens who are willing to work, anxious to work, and who are unable to procure employment; and, if the Congress adjourns without taking any action looking to provision for their necessities, before we reconvene next December there may result suffering, which can not now be anticipated in detail, because of the threatened breakdown in local agencies or rather the exhaustion of their resources and funds.

With assurances that the Budget will be balanced and with emergency assistance in sight for those in distress, a well-considered construction program may be promptly authorized and entered upon by the issuance of, say, $2,000,000,000 of tax-exempt bonds, to be spent upon self-liquidating or profit-making enterprises, such as tunnels, bridges, and the destruction of slum districts in the great industrial centers. In instances where their credit resources have not been too far depleted and where authority exists or can be promptly obtained the States and the cities desiring to carry forward construction programs which have been suspended because of lack of credit should deliver to the Government their own tax-exempt obligations, and the revenues from the undertaking should be impounded to pay, first, the running expenses, and, second, interest and sinking fund to the Government.

It is estimated that there is enough work of a municipal nature which has been deferred because of lack of credit to employ more than a million men. Simultaneously with the issuance of these bonds a special tax may be necessary to pay the interest and amortization on the bonds and thus relieve the balanced Budget of any burden involved. I know this feature of the suggestion implies difficulties, but it is useless to balance the Budget by one act, by the tax bill, if in the making of additional appropriations we upset that balance. So the suggestion is for the formulation of a self-liquidating construction program, with the understanding that the interest and the sinking fund necessary will be provided.

The benefits to be derived from this method of increasing the buying power are not limited to the sums actually spent for employment, but extend to the revival of business and the sale of material, supplies, and other commodities. In addition, improved living conditions may be anticipated by the use of a portion of the funds in improvements in slum and tenement districts, where the rent of structures now in use could be lowered from the present charges, according to information supplied me, and yet be sufficient to pay interest and sinking fund upon the venture.

The 30-hour week, the application of the equalization fee to wheat as a test as to whether it is practicable to make tariff rates effective as to agricultural products, and modification of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act so as to permit loans to farm-loan associations, are recommended as worthy subjects of legislation. It is especially emphasized that the Budget be balanced, that emergency relief legislation be enacted, and that a self-liquidating construction program be authorized and carried forward.

I thank the Senate for its patient attention to my remarks.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I should like to have published in the RECORD, following the speech of the Senator from Arkansas, a memorandum prepared by a committee of the American Legion and the American Federation of Labor setting out definitely the plan that has been discussed, with a number of illustrations of the self-liquidating projects that might be considered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

MEMORANDUM

There are to-day between eight and nine million unemployed, many of whom are reaching the starvation point—business is still receding with unemployment increasing—reports from many sections of the country indicate a growing and threatening social unrest.

This condition should be immediately corrected in some constructive manner for the general good.

METHOD

Creation of large works program through Government credit.

PURPOSE

Employment of between 2,500,000 and 3,500,000 workers with resultant increases in general business throughout the country.

CONDITIONS

1. Must prove their economic desirability.

2. Must prove their ability to become self-liquidating within a reasonable period by the establishment of either tolls or other amortizing charges.

3. Must produce the greatest number of labor hours per dollar expended.

4. Each State in the Union to be given an opportunity to participate, thereby giving the unemployed in each State a fair share of the work and eliminating the wasteful effort of the unemployed moving from one State to another.

5. Establishment of a board similar to the War Industry Board to pass on, supervise, and carry out the above purposes.

Examples of projects which have been engineered and are ready to go forward promptly are:

Bridge over the Mississippi River at New Orleans, costing $14,500,000, to be constructed jointly by the city of New Orleans and State of Louisiana. We understand the Southern Pacific Railroad has agreed to pay a rental for the use of the bridge sufficient to cover interest and sinking fund. Approximately 60,000 tons of steel involved.

Delaware River Joint Commission has authorized $10,000,000 to build high-speed subway system to connect Philadelphia and Camden. To be repaid by tolls.

California toll-bridge authority, created by California Legislature, power to build bridge from San Francisco to Oakland. Cost approximately $75,000,000. To be repaid by tolls.

Portland-Tualatin tunnel through the hills west of Portland, Oreg., authorized 1930. To be repaid by tolls.

Bridge St. Lawrence River. Engineering study completed. Cost approximately $4,000,000. To be repaid by tolls.

Thirty-eighth Street tunnel under Hudson River, costing approximately $90,000,000, authorized to be constructed by Port of New York Authority. Understand engineering work completed. To be repaid by tolls.

Triborough Bridge across East River costing $30,000,000. Work already started, but stopped account lack of funds. To be repaid by tolls.

Hudson-Catskill Bridge costing $3,500,000. Already authorized State of New York. Engineering work practically completed. To be repaid by tolls.

Hydroelectric power development Columbia River. Much of the necessary engineering work done. Probable cost upward $100,000,000. To be repaid by consumer charges.

Similar toll bridges, with engineering work done, projected in Chicago, St. Louis, Detroit, and Boston. To be repaid by tolls.

Large amounts of waterworks for communities of size projected and engineered. Estimated amount between $300,000,000 and $500,000,000. To be repaid by tolls.

LOANS TO STATES AND MUNICIPALITIES

Mr. NORBECK obtained the floor.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. NORBECK. I do.

Mr. DAVIS. Out of order, I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill and have it referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency; and I ask that the clerk read it, if possible.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator yield for the reading of the bill?

Mr. NORBECK. I do not like to do that now. I have no objection to the introduction of bills. I have no objection to anything that will take just a moment or two. Will not the Senator state the substance of the bill briefly?

Mr. DAVIS. It will take only a second to read it.

Mr. NORBECK. Very well. I will take the Senator's word for it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the bill will be read.

The bill (S. 4632) to authorize the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to make loans to States and municipalities was read the first time at length as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 5 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"Within the foregoing limitations of this section the corporation may also make loans to States or municipalities or political subdivisions thereof to aid in temporary financing for unemployment relief, and when, in the opinion of the board of directors of the corporation, any such States, municipality, or political subdivision is unable to obtain funds upon reasonable terms through banking channels or from the general public, and the character and value of the security offered are such as to furnish adequate assurance of ability to repay within the time fixed therefor and to meet other obligations in connection therewith: Provided, That the aggregate sums advanced under this paragraph shall not exceed $500,000,000."

Mr. GORE addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield?

Mr. NORBECK. I yield for anything brief. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. I merely wanted to object to the second reading of that bill to-day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is entered.

EFFECTS OF UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. NORBECK. For what purpose?

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, if the Senator from South Dakota wishes to discuss the pending bill, I shall not interfere with him. I did wish to comment on the statement made by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]; but if the Senator wishes to go ahead with his prepared address, of course, I shall not interfere.

Mr. NORBECK. If the Senator wants to speak for, say, two or three minutes, it will be all right. Otherwise I prefer to proceed.

Mr. COPELAND. I thank the Senator. I should like to speak for a minute.

I find in my mail this morning two letters that bear so directly on what has been said by the Senator from Arkansas that I should like to quote a paragraph. I am much concerned, and think the matter is more important than anything else we can possibly consider at this moment.

A teacher writes me that the other morning she found the children of her school unable to grasp the lesson because they were too hungry for their minds to function. One of the children answered her question as to home conditions by saying, "To-day is not my turn to eat."

When we have conditions like that in the homes of America it is time that the Congress of the United States gave some attention to them.

Here is a letter in the same mail from a Methodist minister in the northern part of my State, who says:

This entire north country is seething with communism. People are hungry and desperate. My son has been on one-third time, at small pay, for a year. His children cry for food. My son-in-law has lost his position. I am helping to feed his family from my small, poorly paid income. Expect revolution. I marvel at the patience of our American serfs. We expect no sympathy from those who have three square meals a day.

Mr. President, when reputable persons, persons of high character, write me, as this teacher and this preacher have done, it is time that we gave thought to the hungry people in America. I am glad that the Senator from Arkansas has voiced this sentiment, because, in my judgment, we can choose between feeding the people or having some great social and political disaster, which we wish to avoid, happen to the country.

I thank the Senator from South Dakota for permitting me to speak. I wanted it to appear in the RECORD immediately following what the Senator from Arkansas has said; and if time permitted I should wish to enlarge upon the subject.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. NORBECK. For what purpose?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Will the Senator yield for as brief a statement as that of the Senator from New York on the address of the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. NORBECK. I beg the Senator's pardon, but I do not want to open up a general debate here. I am trying to make a few remarks and get through with them.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I shall reserve my remarks until later.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

Mr. NORBECK. I yield for the transaction of routine business.

TAX ON IMPORTED LUMBER

Mr. FLETCHER presented a telegram embodying a resolution unanimously adopted at a meeting of southern-pine manufacturers, New Orleans, La., which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW ORLEANS, LA., May 10, 1932.

Senator DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

At meeting to-day of southern-pine manufacturers from every Southern State following resolution unanimously adopted:

"Whereas the lumber industry of the United States is now operating at approximately 20 per cent of capacity, and with the many communities in the South dependent entirely upon the sawmills thousands of families are undergoing extreme hardship and privation because of the forced curtailment of lumber production; and

"Whereas Canadian trade agreements with Australia, South Africa, England, Ireland, and Scotland, preferential duties of other countries, and the general depreciation of foreign currency have practically eliminated the exportation of lumber by the United States to countries which heretofore have consumed tremendous quantities; and

"Whereas with only the domestic markets remaining and these being on an extremely subnormal basis of consumption, the lumber manufacturers are faced with the dumpage of surplusage by Canadian producers, who are protected by higher prices in British-controlled territories, and with the importations of lumber produced in Russia from confiscated timber with convict or forced labor; and

"Whereas the Senate Finance Committee, recognizing the principle of protecting the natural resources of this country and the labor engaged in their conversion, has incorporated in the pending revenue bill import taxes on certain commodities, including lumber: Therefore, be it

"Resolved, That we, manufacturers of southern-pine lumber, representing all of the Southern States, in meeting assembled, urge upon our Congressmen and Senators the vital importance to their constituents and to the country at large of this tax on lumber imports; and be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution be mailed to Congressmen and Senators of the United States from all of the States represented at this meeting with the recommendation that party principles be brushed aside during the existing emergency and that they give their full support to this measure, which will not only serve to provide additional Federal revenue but will relieve a basic industry of uneconomic competition and more quickly provide employment for the hundreds of thousands of men and women whose only means of livelihood is provided by the lumber industry."

May we urge your active interest and support?

REMONETIZATION OF SILVER

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to present certain petitions in support of the use of silver in the monetary system of the world. These petitions are signed by a large number of citizens of Tacoma, Wash., and surrounding cities. They are in support of proposals by Mr. Arthur G. Prichard, of Tacoma, Wash. I should like to have these petitions referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CAREY in the chair). Without objection, the petitions will be received and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

RELIEF OF AGRICULTURE—DEEP WATERWAY

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD and refer to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry a resolution adopted at the Republican State Convention of Minnesota held on the 30th day of April, 1932.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The resolution is as follows:

FROM REPORT OF RESOLUTIONS COMMITTEE ADOPTED AT REPUBLICAN STATE CONVENTION OF APRIL 30, 1932, ST. PAUL, MINN.

Agriculture is our basic industry. The prosperity of the whole State and Nation depends on the prosperity of agriculture.

We reaffirm the principles stated in our national Republican platforms that our National Government enact practical and efficient measures which will place the agricultural interests of the United States on a basis of economic equality with other industries to assure its greater success and prosperity, and we instruct our delegates to the National Republican Convention to work to secure the indorsement of policies that will insure adequate protection of farm products from invasion by foreign and insular imports, the orderly and economic marketing of farm products, and the handling of our agricultural surplus in such manner as to protect our farmers from the depressed markets of the world.

One essential to the securing of better prices for farm commodities is economical transportation. We favor development of our inland waterways and the early development of a deep waterway to the sea by way of the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence River.

Amendment: Furthermore, we urge our representatives in Congress to do all in their power to hasten a sufficiently large appropriation by Congress toward paying our part of the cost of said seaway, so that construction of this great improvement of such vital importance to these many States may be completed at the earliest date possible. It is requested that copies of these resolutions be forwarded by our secretary to each Senator and Member of Congress.

THE LATE SENATOR HARRIS, OF GEORGIA

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD a resolution adopted by the members of the Georgia Cotton Growers' Cooperative Association at their recent annual convention in appreciation of the service rendered by my late colleague, William J. Harris, to the agricultural interests of the State of Georgia.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas all Georgia has suffered an irreparable loss in the passing of Senator William J. Harris, who has long been identified with the affairs of the State of Georgia and who has performed with distinction a valuable and noble public service for the people of this State; and

Whereas we, as farmers, having long since learned to appreciate the value and sincerity of his public service for the farmers of Georgia and for all agricultural movements dedicated to the improvement of the financial and living condition of the producers; and

Whereas his death will cause not only to the farmers in our State but to all classes of our citizens the deepest sorrow in the hearts of his fellow Georgians, whom he loved and served faithfully: Therefore be it

Resolved by the members of the Georgia Cotton Growers' Cooperative Association in annual convention assembled on this the 19th day of April, 1932—

1. That we wish to express our appreciation for the long and untiring service performed by him at all times for the best interest of all Georgians, and particularly for the farmers of his State.

2. That we shall always remember him as one who was fair to all, courageous in the support of what he thought was right, and at all times a friend and servant of his people.

3. That we wish to express to the family of Senator Harris our deepest sympathy in the loss of their loved one and our able, loyal, and devoted friend.

4. And be it further resolved, That a copy of this resolution be entered upon the minutes of this association and that a copy be furnished to the members of the family of Senator Harris.

INCREASE OF BANKING FACILITIES

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 4412) to provide for the safer and more effective use of the assets of Federal reserve banks and of national banking associations to regulate interbank control, to prevent the undue diversion of funds into speculative operations, and for other purposes.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, I am sorry to differ from the distinguished Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] on even a single section of the bill on which he and the committee have worked so faithfully for 23 months.

It will be two years in June since the Senator from Virginia introduced this bill. The hearings have been held before a subcommittee, of which I have been a member. I have been well acquainted with the progress made and the changes in the bill; but I may add that even before June two years ago the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] had this matter before the committee in somewhat different form. No action was taken at that time for various reasons, mainly for lack of time; but later the committee decided to go ahead under the Glass plan. A great many obstacles have been encountered. Many changes have been made.

AN INDICTMENT

I was more interested in the Senator's criticism of the practices of Federal reserve banks yesterday than in anything else I have heard in this Chamber. It was a frank and fair statement by a man whose courage and sincerity in this matter have never been questioned, by the greatest student of banking in this Chamber, by the author of the Federal reserve act. His indictment is severe. Summed up briefly, it is that the system has been controlled from New York, notwithstanding the fact that a Government board, the Federal Reserve Board, centered in Washington, with supervisory powers, were intended to control the whole system. The governor of a branch bank of New York—Federal reserve bank—set himself up as the head of the whole system, took no orders from the Washington board; in fact, defied them, and was recognized in other countries, especially in England, as the head of the "central" bank of the United States. The governors of the different branches held meetings and decided on policies.

The Federal Reserve Board were ignored and insulted to the point of exasperation until some mild measures were actually taken by the Federal Reserve Board to prove they were still in existence. They were willing to be ignored in most things, but they were not willing to be ignored in all things. Just think of it! A branch bank in New York has assumed to speak for the whole system. That is the story that he told us yesterday—a fact too well known, too sadly known—and I admire the courage of the author of the system in bringing those facts before the Senate and the country.

The Senator from Virginia spoke about the use of the system for speculative purposes. He said that instead of retarding gambling and speculation the Federal reserve bank has become a fountain for that kind of operations. This bill is a desperate effort of the author so to change the act, so to reform it, as more nearly to serve the purpose for which it was passed.

The Senator told us more than that. He said that the Federal Reserve Bank of the United States has attempted to stabilize Europe instead of the United States of America. Those are severe indictments, Mr. President, of the banking system that we cherish so much, that we believe to be an improvement on previous systems that we have had. The Senator tells us frankly that it has not operated for the benefit of the United States. The remarks of the Senator are a severe indictment of the shortcomings of the system, or, rather, the abuses of it by selfish interests and by officials in authority. But, of course, the Senator is right.

MY CRITICISM

I had in mind making some criticisms. Mine may be more mild than those of the Senator from Virginia, but they are not included in his. I have reference to what seem to be fundamental failures in the system—the failure of a beautiful theory to work as expected.

Well do I remember the hope and the promise of the Federal reserve act. It was going to provide a currency automatically elastic. It was going to end depressions. That meant it was going to prevent wild speculations and resultant booms. We were going to have a system with a governor serving on same. It would regulate itself. When the demands of business were great the currency would expand proportionately. When the demands slowed down there would be an automatic and proper contraction of the currency, for much of the currency was based upon borrowings from the Federal reserve system. The millennium was near at hand.

THE DIFFERENCE BETWEEN THEORY AND PRACTICE

Mr. President, we are wiser now. We know that speculation and booms were possible; I believe they were actually aggravated. The large banks had the Federal reserve system to draw on and it created a recklessness with them heretofore unknown, and depressions followed.

It seems now, as we look back over it, that the main effect of the Federal reserve system was to give an extra swing to both the high and the low periods. The booms went higher on account of the Federal reserve bank, and I am wondering if the depression did not actually get worse. Certainly the banks are not making any use of the system for the purpose of stimulating business; it fails to work. But Senator GLASS has specific remedies for the weaknesses to which he points. I will admit I have no remedy for the weakness to which I am pointing. I am not suggesting a remedy; I am asking for an explanation. Possibly it lies in the fact that conditions are different than they used to be and that old rules do not govern.

ONE OLD RULE

For a long time economists have said that "other things being equal" prices correspond to the amount of money in circulation. Increase the circulation, you raise the price; decrease it, and the prices fall. But the old rule started with the words "other things being equal," and in this complex era it does seem that other things are not always equal. Perhaps that explains it.

For instance, Mr. President, we have found that business activities through the inflation period do not depend so much on currency as on bank credit. Bank checks took the place of currency. Their stimulating effect on prices seems to have been enormous. The discontinuance of their use seems to have had a disastrous effect on prices and on business. I do not know how to start these wheels in motion. I am wondering whether the Goldsborough bill, that has passed the House and will in the near future be taken up by the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency, will have an important bearing on this question. The purpose of the Goldsborough bill is to regulate prices by further inflation or deflation of currency.

But I am not speaking to condemn the Federal reserve system. It is our system. It is the best system we have had. We are just making slow progress in our plans. We are just paying for experience. I believe the Federal reserve system was a step forward. But if the American people had known the price they were to pay for it they would have shied off from it.

However, there are compensatory features in it. For instance, it probably took us over the war period without a breakdown in our money system, when the old system would not have done that. So we have to put down a big credit mark there. In other words, the Federal reserve system and the fundamental theory on which it was based failed to do that which was promised for it, but it did something else which justified its existence. That seems to be the way when we enact new legislation; we are unable to foresee what it will lead to.

GLASS BILL

I did not intend to speak on the Federal reserve system; I did not intend to speak critically of the Glass bill. I started out by saying that I thought the bill was an honest effort to remedy the evils which have developed, the evils which could not be foreseen. The author feels it is a good bill, and I want to be helpful and not be in the way. I differ with him in one matter. This bill provides for the extension of branch banking. I believe it to be a poor system—a dangerous system. It is an enlargement of centralized banking—a centralization of the control of the credit of the country as I see it—and I am fearful of it. That is why I want to speak my word in protest. That is why I have offered an amendment to strike out section 19 of the bill, which permits an enlargement of the branch-banking privileges.

BRANCH BANKING

I do that mainly because I believe in the American system of banking. We have a dual system. We have two systems. We have one controlled by the States, we have another one controlled by the Federal Government. The two have grown up side by side. I think they have rendered splendid service, and I think we should be ever jealous of anything that will tend to destroy one system for the benefit of the other.

I believe the State banking system is perhaps of even greater importance than the Federal system. Certainly it is the larger one and does the most business. Therefore I assume it enjoys greater confidence of depositors, and I do not want to be a party to any step which I think will tend to destroy it.

I say frankly that there are many plans under way here now to bring about a unified system of banking, a single system of banking, and I am afraid that the single system will soon fall into very few hands, fall into central control, and therefore I want to be among those who protest against that plan.

We have the dual system of banking. That is classification No. 1, State banks and Federal banks. But we can classify again. We have another division which is equally important. We have the unit bank, the American kind of a bank, the bank owned and managed by the home folks of a community, the bank which the law contemplated should be the bank. Federal laws and State laws provided for unit banks. The laws provided that the stockholders should be natural persons, not artificial persons, not corporations, not holding companies, not trust companies, not some other imaginary thing, but natural persons.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Not dummies.

Mr. NORBECK. Not dummies, but real people.

CHAIN BANKS

Mr. President, the first violation of the spirit of the law was perhaps not a violation of the letter of the law, for the owners of one bank would reach out to the next town and get control of a second bank and a third bank, and then we had what was called the chain system in banking. The system has not been good.

No one recommends the chain system, neither bankers nor political economists—not even an official of the Treasury. It is probably the weakest system we have in this country, especially when the chain includes any large number of banks.

GROUP BANKS (ERRONEOUSLY CALLED CHAIN BANKS)

In recent years there has been developed another system of banking, which is also an evasion of the law, and is now generally recognized under the name of "group banking." A holding company is formed and control of banks is secured through the purchase of shares of stock in same, which are then held by the holding company. The owners of the holding company, therefore, control the banks. The holding company is an intermediary, or an affiliate. It is generally the agent or instrument of some large bank seeking to build up a branch-banking system, which is not permitted by law. This fact certainly must have been known to important bankers who employed the best legal counsel. Only recently did I learn that the Attorney General of the United States some 20 years ago held to the view that the stockholders of national banks could only be natural persons, not holding companies or other artificial persons.

Under this system, the old bank charters were left in existence, the old board of directors was retained. It had the appearance of local control, even though members of the board owned only one share each. But, of course, the local board was without control, except by provision from the holding company, or those who controlled the holding company, for they selected and elected the local board. But the local board was at least composed of people of the community, acquainted with its needs, knowing the abilities and responsibilities of borrowers, being able to be helpful and pass judgment in matters that came up. It was not entirely deprived of home rule. There was at least the right of petition, the right to speak up. There was at least somebody in the town where the bank was located who was interested in the welfare of the bank and the welfare of the community.

BRANCH BANKING

That is the third point. We are asked to go on to a fourth one; that is a general branch-banking system. Under this system there will be only one board, the board of the central bank. The branch bank is more likely to become a branch office. Its personnel will be reduced. More of the work will be done at the central office. There would be hundreds of branches for each bank. Loans would have to be made according to rules; they would have to be handled with great speed. They would be handled by a man who lives far away and is often unfamiliar with the situation in a community and strange to the character and outlook of the borrower. The loan would be reduced largely to mathematics and bank rules.

Mr. President, in Canada I heard of loans being passed on by the chief officer at the rate of 5 or 10 a minute. What chance would a prairie farmer have under such a system in getting consideration of his case? I feel that branch banking will arrest the growth and development of the country.

The unit bank is, as I said, an American bank. It came into its full flower and strength during a century of growth in this country; and what country has had any growth like ours? In every community was a bank that had the deposits of the community, the savings of the community, in charge of the leading men of the community, men interested in the progress of every person in the community.

Loans were not always made according to rules. They were not standardized. Sometimes they were made upon the ability of a borrower to make headway. If a man was entitled to credit and had the confidence of the community, had good character and economical habits, and wanted to get $50 to buy a cow, he could get the $50 to buy the cow. Under the branch-banking system such a loan, if made at all, would be made upon the showing of adequate security. Such an applicant will be told that if he will mortgage three cows they will give him enough to buy one cow. He has to say, "I have not the other two cows," and that would end it. This is what they call sound banking in the big centers—it is sound on paper.

Mr. President, the Federal banking laws and the laws of the States provide that the stockholders of the banks shall be responsible for twice the value of their stock. This is for the protection of the depositors in case of bank failures. The full amount of the double liability is not ordinarily recovered, but the larger amount of it is. It is a real protection for the depositors. It is a responsibility on the bank. It is a warning to its officers. It has a healthy effect; it leads to good banking. Numerous groups have now been organized throughout the country that issue holding-company stock in lieu of bank stock. The holding-company stock does not carry the double liability. The assets of the holding company are made up very largely of bank stock. It has been argued that in case of a single bank failure, or a few bank failures, there would be a good claim against the holding company. But no one will maintain that the holding company is responsible for any substantial amount of double-liability claims. I do not mean that all the group banks did that; too many of them did. A few group banks tried to maintain the rule of double-liability provision on their holding-company stocks.

Where does the branch system come from? It is a foreign system. It has grown up in small countries, countries small in area, where the central bank would have a branch a few miles out, where there was actual contact anyway, where they did not have any conditions such as there are here. A branch-banking system has served some countries well, but it has only served countries with small areas well. It fit those countries. But how anxious we are to find something foreign to transplant onto American soil. Is this going to be the next importation?

We have quite a little start in it. The first thing we knew the big bank people came to Congress and said, "New York is getting to be a big city. We ought to have some branch banks here in the city." Congress said, "Yes." Later they came and said, "This should be extended to the metropolitan areas." We agreed to that. It was rather an indefinite thing, I think, but we agreed to it, although some said on the floor, "This is just an entering wedge. The danger will come later."

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH in the chair). Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. NORBECK. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. I want to call attention to the fact that when they asked for the branch banking for the metropolitan area the statement was made on the floor of the Senate by some of those who were favoring that that this was not going to extend into various communities outside of the metropolitan areas but that it was done purely for the purpose of making it possible for the big banks to compete with outlying districts in the metropolitan area. I said then just what was going to happen—that the next step would be to authorize these same banks to establish branches. A statement was made on the floor of the Senate here yesterday with reference to the lobby that was here at that time to prevent branch banking. Never was there any such lobby present at that time as there is present in the Halls of Congress at the present time for the purpose of putting over this bill with reference to branch banking and some of the features which the bill contains.

Mr. NORBECK. I agree with the Senator in that. I am further confused by the statement on the floor yesterday that the lobby was sent here by the loop banks of Chicago. The loop banks are the ones who favor the branch-banking system. But there may be a mistake about that statement.

Now, they are here asking for State branch banking by State units only, giving us the assurance that the unit is small, and therefore the danger is small. I hear it stated all around that it should be a larger district, should be a Federal reserve district. The Comptroller of the Currency first announced that he favored branch banking by Federal reserve districts, but later by trade areas. Can anyone tell me what trade area is? What is the trade area of a metropolitan city like New York or Chicago? It covers the entire country, does it not?

We are soon going to be faced with a demand for a nation-wide banking system, of course, and that is the old fight coming up again. It is a reminder of the banking situation which existed in Andrew Jackson's time, when centralized credit had such enormous power that it was nearly impossible to encounter it politically.

The Comptroller of the Currency appeared before the committee and recommended the branch-banking system. His argument was based on the fact that we have had 6,000 bank failures during the previous 10 years—"sufficiently indicating the existence of fundamental adverse conditions." He had reference to banking and not agriculture.

In his statement made on January 19, 1931, before the Committee on Banking and Currency he dealt with the total number of State banks that had failed. He does not tell the total amount of money involved in the failures. He refers to an annual report he made. The annual report carries the same mistake and tells about the large number of State-bank failures, and does not tell anything about the sum involved in those failures. On cross-examination he admitted that it might be it was not any more than the amount involved in the failure of some of the big banks. We called his attention to the fact that the failure of one bank in New York involved more than $200,000,000 in deposits and had 450,000 depositors. The loss involved was four times that involved in all the bank failures in the State of South Dakota, where there has been quite a general breakdown of the banking system, due to the agricultural deflation. Why conceal these facts when he is trying to build up an argument?

Then we were told that the branch-banking system is safer, and yet this very New York bank to which I just referred had 60 branches. If they were 60 insurance companies, why should that bank have failed?

BRANCHES AND CHAINS

The failures of chain banks, group banks, and branch banks during the last few years are well known to everyone. It has created a very difficult situation in some of the Southern States.

Those who desire the unified-bank system are always telling us about the better management of the national banks. I do not care to make any comparisons of them except to observe that in some cases the State banks seemed to be handled much better than the national banks. The reverse is true in other cases. The two systems have grown up side by side. It is not the national-bank system that is the larger one, it is not the national system that enjoys the confidence of the people and the largest number of depositors. It is the State system that does that. The system placed in jeopardy by section 19 of this bill is not a State system; it has the largest number of depositors, the greatest amount of deposits, and does the greatest business.

If I understood the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] correctly the other day, he said he had gradually come to the opinion that a branch-banking system would prevent bank failures. I am not sure that he said it; I may have misunderstood him; but I do know the advocates of a branch-banking system use that as one argument. How would it prevent failures? When somebody comes along and offers us something for nothing and tells us we can lift ourselves by our own bootstraps we are likely to fall for it. How will the branch-banking system prevent bank failures? By changing the form of banking? By centralized control? How are we going to make a poor note good by taking it over? How are we going to restore agriculture and industry? Are we not talking about the effect instead of the cause of the banking trouble?

FIFTY YEARS OF GOOD BANKING

Is it not a fact that every system was good for half a century when the Nation prospered and most of the banks held up and we had State banks and we had national banks which rendered service and went along? Then when the earning power was destroyed, when values began to come down, banks failed. The earning power of the farmer was destroyed first and that is why the farm banks went down first. The comptroller might have told us that. Why conceal that from us? Can any banking system be very safe if the economic condition is unsound, if everything keeps sliding down, if the security we take one year is not good the next year? Can any system be sound under those conditions?

POSTAL SAVINGS BANKS

I was over in Canada a few years ago. We have to get away from home once in a while to get a new angle. Distance lends enchantment. I was told then they very much admired our banking system. They understood that depositors had not lost a penny in 15 years under our system. I did not know what the gentleman was talking about who told me that. I finally learned that he was talking about our postal savings banks. They looked good to him until I called his attention to the fact that they had no loss because they took no risk and rendered no service. If that is the ideal in banking, if the only thing involved is safety of deposits, we have that in the postal savings banks and we do not need to go to branch banking for it. We have a perfect system now, but it is not helpful to agriculture and it is not helpful to industry and it is not helping in the growth and development of the country, because if we put all our moneys in the postal savings banks everything would come to a standstill.

There is no criticism of the postal savings bank. It has been a fine thing for the poor man, the man who does not know enough about banking and bankers to take a chance on using their facilities. It is at least one safe plan, but we can not adopt it as our universal system of banking.

DOES SAFETY LIE IN BULK?

For a generation we have been told that the large corporations were the strong corporations and the big banks were the good banks, but we have found many exceptions to the rule—so much that we can no longer accept the rule.

The Banking Committee have listened to two arguments this winter—one a plea that the large banks should be permitted to have branches because they are so strong, they are so wise, they are so benevolent, they have such a desire to be helpful.

Then again we have been implored to appropriate large sums of money as a treasury to help the large banks because we can not afford to let the large ones get into jeopardy. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation legislation was asked for by the big fellows, and the benefits have not to any great extent extended to the smaller banks—certainly not to the general public. The most that can be said for it is it was a move to avoid a threatened disaster. This legislation was asked for by the very men who now pride themselves on their size and their strength.

We are told there is such a great demand for banking facilities in towns and villages where there are none. It sounds reasonable, but the committee have also listened to much testimony to the effect that with better highways the trade gravitates to the centers, and the banks in the smaller communities are unneccessary, as well as unprofitable. Even the farmers and their families prefer to go to the larger towns to shop. They find greater selections of goods in the large cities, and there is a tendency on their part to do their banking business 20 to 50 miles from home. In former days, before the automobile came into being, they considered 10 miles a considerable distance.

We are told of the great desire of some of the large banks to "save" the banking system. From listening to the pleas, they are all ready to take over all the banks in the country—good, bad, and indifferent—for the sole purpose of protecting the depositors against losses.

This is ignoring the fact that the weak banks have for a long time been trying to sell out and have not found any buyers.

It is ignoring the fact that the good banks are not for sale at any reasonable price. We have some that are for sale, but it is a matter of dickering, and unfortunately our experience has shown that we have some whose safety and welfare depend on the return of the prosperity of agriculture, depend on the ability of the farmer to pay his notes. But no one cares to assume that risk in buying a bank.

A THOUSAND TELEGRAMS

When I was home in South Dakota last week, I found in many places that one of the group banks had sent out a general call to wire Senator GLASS—wire him on three things:

First. Approve the branch-bank feature of the bill.

Second. Give approval of the plan for the large banks to retain their affiliates—their back door to bad banking—under reasonable regulations, whatever that may be. The definite thing was the affiliates were to be retained.

Third. Approve the liquidating corporation provision in the Glass bill. Nobody seems to object to the latter, so the third provision was not important.

I knew the Senator from Virginia would have a bushel basket full of telegrams in support of the branch-banking feature, and on Monday morning, when he walked into the Senate Chamber with the staggering bundle, I knew what those messages contained. He was not responsible for the propaganda. He was not to blame for showing them. The only point I make is that they do not reflect public sentiment; they reflect "involuntary servitude." I suggest that those telegrams from my State be placed in the RECORD, so they may speak for themselves as to the power of propaganda under a partly centralized form of banking.

Mr. CAREY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. NORBECK. Certainly.

Mr. CAREY. I would like to ask the Senator if they had had one bank with $500,000 capital with a branch in every town in his State, would that have saved the situation in South Dakota?

Mr. NORBECK. It would not have saved the situation if they had rendered any service, because of the shrinkage in property values and the shrinkage in earnings. Of course it did not affect the Postal Savings banks.

Mr. CAREY. The Senator knows that the bill proposes to permit a bank with only $500,000 to cover an entire State with branch banks.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, yes, I think section 19 is too liberal in its capital requirement for branch banks, and while it provides for State units, it does not provide that the ownership must be within the State.

I know of no one in South Dakota who wants to open up a branch bank. I know people in larger cities who favor branch banking in South Dakota, and are here advocating the branch banking system.

The Senator's remark goes to the fundamental thing in banking. If there is any fundamental principle that is recognized in banking, a fundamental principle that is well established and well recognized, it is that a bank must not owe more than ten times what it is worth, because if it does, it is not in a safe condition. In other words, the capital must be one-tenth of the deposits. Liabilities must not be more than ten times the amount of the capital. So if a bank has $100,000 in capital and $1,000,000 in deposits, it has $1,100,000 to protect $1,000,000 in deposits. They can stand a shrinkage, a substantial shrinkage, before there is any danger; but that is based upon experience. It has been found that is the best ratio at which a bank can safely do business and render service to the community.

What is it this bill proposes to use in place of it? It is proposed to increase the banking business without increasing the banking capital. Is not that right, may I ask the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. CAREY. Yes; the Senator is correct.

Mr. NORBECK. They say if we will let them take over these banks with their capital structure, they will run the business as an office. We are told that branches that have losses equal to their capital can be taken over by the chain and operated as a bank. That is a violation of the rule. It is proposed to ignore the very fundamental thing upon which sound banking is based. They are going to defend that proposal by bringing in here a sheet to show that they have a margin of capital over deposits, because in the shrinkage of business in general the deposits have shrunk too. But we all know that is when the danger mark is reached in banking, in periods of depression like this, because deposits decrease during a depression, values shrink, the paper in the portfolio is not as good as previously. Losses will have to be charged off.

Bank depositors recognize the ratio of normal times and do not permit reduction in capital on account of shrinkage in deposits until there has been a most rigid examination of the bank's assets. The ratio of normal conditions must be maintained. Is Congress going to lend itself to changing that ratio? If we do that, we strike at the very foundation of banking. No, they should not owe in normal times more than ten times what they are worth.

Mr. President, it is now 1.30 p. m., and I want to say to the Senators who may be hungry and desire to go to their lunches that I am not going to deliver the whole speech which I had intended to make at this time.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Go ahead!

Mr. NORBECK. We have had so much expert advice given to the Committee on Banking and Currency that we would be wise if we were not dizzy. I am sure that applies to the author of the bill as it does to me. He has been pestered day and night. Bankers have wired out all over the country and propaganda came back, "Vote against the Glass bill."

Then some little change would be made, and they would wire out over the country again and propaganda would come back, "Vote for the Glass bill." There was propaganda pro and propaganda con. Hearings and arguments were heaped on top of hearings and arguments. Misstatements galore were made by lobbyists, misstatements that have been sent out of here, because the lobbyists have to maintain their offices also. They have to cry "Wolf" once in a while if they are going to continue to draw their salaries, so they sent out warnings galore against the Glass bill and against this and that section of the Glass bill and against the minority of the committee, and against the "wild jackasses" on the committee.

I protest only against section 19, and I protest because the compromise provision in same was removed a very short time ago after being a provision in this bill since 1930. The compromise provision was that no branch banks should be established in any States, except in States that permitted a branch-banking system. This was struck out, and section 19 now provides that national banks may have branches, regardless of the laws of the State.

EXPERT ADVICE

Among the wise men who came to Washington to aid this committee in drafting the bill was the then president of the American Bankers' Association, not the man who is now president. I think they have had three presidents since the committee started its work on this bill—one every year. He attempted to lay much of the banking trouble in agricultural States to the increased prices of land. He complained there was a wild speculation, and the proof of it was that land had doubled in price.

When we asked him if anything else had been doubled in value, when we pinned him down and asked about a pair of shoes doubling in value, about a suit of clothes doubling in value, about a locomotive doubling in price, and numerous other things doubling as well, he gave up. He did not know what he was talking about. Yet he was the one who had been giving advice to the bankers of the land about how to get out of the depression.

We also had expert advice from a man who had been president of the United States Chamber of Commerce. When the farm relief bill was pending a number of years ago his advice then was to keep the Government out of business. But he came before the Banking Committee this winter and recommended the Government go into business for the purpose of helping the banker. He advocated the passage of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation legislation. He was another one of those who believed the Government should stay out of business when the other fellow was in trouble but should go into business when he himself is in trouble.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. NORBECK. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. May I say to the Senator that as I came in the door, having been called out for a moment, I heard the Senator allude to what seems to be a charge that the loop bankers in the city of Chicago have been maintaining a lobby here. Will the Senator let me know whence that information comes and what foundation there is for it?

Mr. NORBECK. I had reference to the statement made yesterday by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. In his discussion of the pending bill he referred to such activities in connection with a previous banking bill. I did not question his statement, the Senator will understand; but he did state that the loop bankers, if I understood him right, sponsored the lobby referred to.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. NORBECK. Yes.

Mr. GLASS. If the Senator had read my speech as it appears in the RECORD, he would have noted that I——

Mr. NORBECK. I just heard the Senator's remarks on the floor, and I may be in error. I did not think the statement was correct, and that is why I referred to it.

Mr. GLASS. I corrected my statement with respect to the loop bankers. I did not understand exactly the geography of Chicago. It was an association of bankers outside of the loop which did not want the loop bankers to invade their territory; it was not the loop bankers; and I corrected my speech accordingly.

Mr. President, if I may add a word or two further as pertinent at this moment, I said in my speech that this association of bankers had employed a Congressman to oppose that measure of branch banking provided in the McFadden bill, and that I had the documentary proof to that effect. It will be recalled by Senators that rumors to that effect were so insistent at the time that the Senate itself adopted a resolution directing an investigation of those rumors. A subcommittee of the Banking and Currency Committee of the Senate was appointed to make the investigation. As I recall, the subcommittee consisted of then Senator Sackett, now ambassador to Germany; then Senator Edge, now ambassador to France; and myself. We pursued the inquiry and obtained the documentary proofs with respect to one more or less prominent Member of Congress. We had the testimony of this man's family physician that any revelations of that nature would endanger his life, and therefore the subcommittee determined not to pursue its investigation any farther. That Congressman has since died, and because of that fact perhaps I should not have made the reference that I did make in my speech.

I understand that in the other House to-day a very vituperative reference was made to my statement, and the validity of it was called in question. If there is anybody in this or the other branch of Congress who is now eager to make a revelation of the facts, I still have the documentary evidence, and, if anybody is willing to take the responsibility to reveal the facts, it is accessible to him.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. NORBECK. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. I take it for granted that in these observations of the eminent Senator from Virginia and of the Senator from South Dakota there is no charge that the bankers of Chicago, known as the loop bankers, or any others, were the parties perpetrating these offenses?

Mr. NORBECK. I am not able to answer that question. I would rather that the Senator from Virginia answer as to who the responsible parties were.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, my statement stands in the RECORD, except that I was confused as to the geography of Chicago and located the offense within the loop rather than without the loop.

Mr. LEWIS. I will merely add that it seems to be an instance of "looping the loop." [Laughter.]

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, if the Senator from South Dakota will pardon me, when the Senator from Virginia was speaking I understood him rather than having reference to the "loop" banks to say "loot" banks.

Mr. LEWIS. That is a matter that may be corrected by a "t."

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, the Senator from Virginia called attention to one of the real evils developed in the banking system. When he made his speech yesterday he spoke about the pressure put upon the banks, and said it resulted in involuntary servitude; the big city banks, from whom accommodations had been received, insisted upon unloading on them such securities. The bank did not want them, but had to take same. Next, the bank had to find a way to sell the securities, for they were not readily salable. The banks also had to put on pressure. They could not put the pressure on the depositors; they put it on the borrowers. Many of the borrowers would be called in and suggestion made to them they should buy certain stocks or certain bonds. When the borrower objected—he could not afford to do so—he was told to think it over, the bank would take an additional note for this. After the borrower had thought it over a day or two he would go back and meekly comply with the suggestion. He could not afford to displease his banker any more than the bank in the country could reject the advice of the big city bank. Times were hard and everybody knew it. The sharks took advantage of their victims. The victim was first the little bank and next the customer of such bank. In this way bad securities were sold all over the country. The Senator from Virginia is right; it is involuntary servitude, but it is not due to our system of banking; it is due to the business situation.

THE CURE

Does anybody believe the cure lies in conferring greater power upon the offending person? With a branch-banking system the small bank would be owned by the large bank, who in turn would be able to enforce more "involuntary servitude"—not less.

AFFILIATES

One of the worst evils that grew up during our period of speculation was the side-line company of the banks, commonly called affiliates. They would be owned by the bank and controlled by the bank, or rather by the officers of the bank. Often it was their side line, and the bank carried the burden.

The affiliate has been described as a back door to the bank. It was usually a back door to bad banking, and with the bursting of the boom it often involved the banks in enormous losses, and in some instances it brought on the failures of banks. One of the purposes of the Glass bill is to bring this system to an end by compelling the banks to dispense with their affiliates, and liberal time is provided—they are given three years to bring this about. Some of the better banks have already separated themselves from the affiliates.

A few good banks have maintained the high standard of business morality in the affiliates, as they have in the banks, but a number of our larger banks have a miserable record in this matter. They are, however, unwilling to dispense with this agency for gathering in the shekels. They are hoping for another boom, another opportunity to shear the lambs. They believe that wool grows rapidly. It has hardly occurred to them their business methods are largely responsible for the present financial condition of the country.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. NORBECK. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. In view of the reference which has been made to involuntary servitude, let me say that every little bank in the Northwest is now practically under involuntary servitude to the larger banks in the great centers; so that it is almost impossible for stockmen and cattlemen in my State to borrow any money from any of the banks because of the fact that they are under the domination of the St. Paul and Minneapolis banks or the big chain banks.

Let me further call the attention of the Senator to the fact that those big banks, the holding-company banks, went out and paid enormous prices for small banks with the money of the good banks in various States of the Northwest, and then floated stock which was practically worthless and loaded it upon their depositors throughout the Northwest.

Mr. NORBECK. Which stock was of doubtful value at the time and proved of low value later on.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. NORBECK. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I should like to call attention to a practice which also amounts to involuntary servitude. I have had many bankers tell me that even bank examiners come to their banks throwing out the thought that it would be good for the local banker in order to get more reserves to acquire more bonds and put bonds in their pouches.

Now they are in such a situation that the greatest losses they have sustained are in that class of paper which they were practically forced to take by the bank examiner and which they did not know anything about—foreign paper from different parts of the country, corporation bonds——

Mr. NORRIS. And paper from foreign countries, too.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Yes; paper from foreign countries, utility bonds, and corporation bonds into the purchase of which they were practically coerced to put their local money, and then put the bonds in their pouches.

Mr. CAREY. Were those State or national banks?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I have been told they were both State and national banks.

Mr. NORBECK. The Senator from Minnesota is quite right; it became a fad. People were taught to believe that property far away from home was good. For instance, I attended a meeting of the Independent Bankers' Association of the State of Minnesota, the home State of the Senator who has just spoken. The superintendent of banks of that State spoke for 30 minutes about bonds, how to classify bonds, and about so-called secondary reserves. There was not a thing said about milk cows in that greatest dairy State in the Union. It was all bonds, foreign bonds, domestic bonds, utility bonds, municipal bonds, Government bonds—bonds, bonds, bonds—as a secondary reserve, as something liquid, a class of securities that to-day is selling at from 20 to 80 cents on the dollar, when the loans which were made to the farmers are still good.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. NORBECK. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. I should like to ask the Senator a question. I have reached the conclusion from his remarks that he is opposed to branch banking. Assuming that the branch-banking feature is eliminated, are there other features in the bill which should be preserved?

Mr. NORBECK. I am committed to the bill, and think there are many splendid things in it. I should like to vote for it if this threatened danger to our section of the country can be removed. I may say that this bill was in the committee for a year or more without this provision in it.

Mr. President, let us reduce the involuntary servitude under which the small unit banks labor, but how are we going to do it?

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. NORBECK. I yield.

Mr. KEAN. I should like to ask a question about the Senator's statement concerning involuntary servitude. If he means involuntary servitude through the Federal reserve banks, of course, under the law the member banks are in involuntary servitude to the Federal reserve banks.

Mr. NORBECK. I think the Senator from New Jersey should address that remark to one more competent to answer it than am I. The Senator from New Jersey himself is a banker, a successful banker, a banker of wide experience, a banker who enjoys the confidence of his community, a banker who does not follow all the fads of banking, who does not subscribe to all the new notions because somebody else tried to foist them on the country. I wish the Senator from New Jersey would devote an hour to this question and speak to the Senate from his lifelong experience and his judgment on these matters. I have been discouraged at the silence of the Senator while this branch-banking matter is pending. Involuntary servitude? Yes; we get away from it by a centralized control, do we?

I talked to one of the greatest branch bankers in this country, and I said, "How did you come to establish a branch system?" He said, "The banks in our section were sending their money elsewhere. We got tired of begging for it. We went out and acquired control of them and told them to send it in here." Yes, there was more "involuntary servitude." It left the local boards of directors in charge; it left the same buildings and the same offices, but tied a real string to them by which it pulled the money to one place, where they can do with it as they please.

I said that the branch system was a foreign system. It is so foreign to us that the nearest example we have of it is the Canadian system, which was an outgrowth of the English system, and quite a natural one. It is a system that serves England well, but does not serve Canada so well, because the conditions are different; and thousands of farmers from our Northwest who have gone into the prairie Provinces will testify to that.

In Canada a number of years ago I got to visiting with a farmer who told his experience with the Canadian banking system. He happened to be a Canadian who was born in Canada. He said that in the early spring he had arranged for the renewal of a small loan and wished to borrow additional money, because he was a well-to-do rancher and had plenty of security. The man in charge told him he could have it. He said, "Come in in 30 days and we will fix it up." The rancher went in in 30 days. There was a new face in the office. Clerks had been shifted. Policies had been changed. Maybe the chairman of the board of directors had a stomach ache or something, and he said, "No," where otherwise he might have said, "Yes"; and he lived 2,000 miles away. All the farmer was told was, "No, no; we have changed our policy. We are not making any loans. We are collecting. You will have to pay your note." There was nobody to appeal to—nobody but the Lord in Heaven.

There was no local representative of the bank. A foreigner in their midst was telling them what they could have and what they could not have.

I know of another case that happened in this country under a similar system, even more tragic than that; but I shall not take the time to relate it.

I have another case that happened in Canada. A well-to-do merchant arranged for a loan. The security was good, and everything was satisfactory. He was to have $5,000, but when the matter went through the machinery down at Montreal, where they go through at a rate of a number of applications per minute, some one in charge of it had marked "$4,000" instead of "$5,000" on it. He could not use that, because it would not take up his obligations. That is what you call "service", "expert service."

SLOW PROGRESS OF CANADA

What has been the effect on Canada? Is there anyone here who will say that the natural resources of Canada do not come in the class of those of the United States, with her fertile soil, a climate that will raise wheat through that whole Northwest for 2,000 long miles, the East with its great fruit country. Land was selling seven years ago, when our depression was well under way, 30 miles north of Niagara Falls for $600 an acre, raw, because it was good fruit land.

Is there anyone who will say that the mineral wealth of Canada is limited? Why, it is well known to be fabulous. They have not started to develop it.

And what about her forests? I believe that she has forests enough to supply the world with lumber.

Is Canada young? The oldest settlement in Canada is older than that of the United States.

Has Canada an inferior population? No one will charge that. It is largely British; but the eastern Provinces were settled by the hard-working and thrifty French—thrifty and prolific. But the large families can not find a place to settle out there, so they come into the States here and crowd our New England farmers; and while we have built up 120,000,000 population, Canada has one-tenth as much.

What does Canada think of it? Oh, they are not all blind to it. I will read something here from a Canadian official document, the proceedings of the House of Commons select standing committee on banking and commerce, 1928. This is a statement by Mr. Arthur E. Darby, director of economic research, Canadian Council of Agriculture. I shall not read it at length; but Mr. Darby states:

> In Canada the chief financing of agriculture has been done by mortgage-loan companies.

He goes on:

> In any case, the ordinary commercial bank, operating for profit, can not cover the whole field of short-term and intermediate credit. * * *
> It may be, as European experience would seem to indicate, that in cooperative credit and banking lies the salvation of agricultural finance.

That is what their own official says about their own banking system—the one we are asked here to adopt.

CANADIAN BANKING SYSTEM

But we hear so much about the safety of the Canadian system. I made an error, in the minority report, in copying a magazine article boosting the Canadian system, in using their figures. Their figures were that there were only 16 failures in 62 years. I thought that was a great deal, considering that they only have 11 banks—more than 100 per cent—but I find that the figures were wrong. They had 26 failures, not 16; I get that from the official reports. Of course, they do not count the branches when they have a failure, and the average Canadian bank has 400 branches under a single management in a central city.

But what is the effect? What is the drift of branch banking in Canada? That is what we want to know.

I maintain that the danger is that we will centralize banking into a few hands here. But we are asked to look at Canada and see what they have done. Yes; let us look at Canada and see what they have done. Let us look at it. Let us not look at part of it but look at all of it. From the Banking System of Canada, by Beckhart, I learn that in 1890, 40 years ago, Canada had 40 banks. In 1928 they had 28. To-day they have 11. How long will it be until they have one?

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. NORBECK. I do.

Mr. WHEELER. I think the Senator will agree with me that practically everybody in the Northwest agrees that the reason why that country was built up at all was because of the independent unit banker in that country who loaned money to the people who went into the stock business and into different enterprises, and they were successful. I venture the assertion that the strongest bank in Montana, at least, is a unit bank located in the city of Butte, Mont., at the present time—much stronger than all the others—and that it serves the local people probably better than any other bank in that whole territory.

Mr. NORBECK. I can say that we have a similar situation in my State.

In answer to this charge that only the national banks are safe, let me call attention to the fact that the largest banking institutions in the United States are not national banks. Has anybody claimed that the Pierpont Morgan banking firm is a national bank? We are told that national banks are well supervised and safe, but there are two sides to that, like everything else.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota farther yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. NORBECK. I do.

Mr. WHEELER. I should like to make this further observation: It was stated on the floor of the Senate yesterday that none of the borrowers were complaining or objecting to branch banking. Let me say to the Senator that since these chain banks came into the State of Montana and into the Northwest stockmen and business men generally in my State have complained because of the fact that they could not get ample credit from the banks from which they formerly had been getting credit.

The sentiment became so strong, as a matter of fact, that some of the leading stockmen wanted to organize a bank in the city of Great Falls. They applied for a charter to the State bank examiner. The application was turned down because of the fact that they said that with these other banks there were ample banking facilities.

They then, as I understood, took up the matter with the comptroller's office here in Washington, and applied for a charter for an independent national bank. They were unable to get it because of the fact that they said there were ample banking facilities in that community.

These were leading stockmen who had money, who were willing to invest and put in a good, substantial bank for the purpose of serving the stock people and other men of that city; and a charter was denied to them, as I understand, both by the State bank examiner and by the national bank examiner.

When the stockmen gathered together in several parts of the State and wanted to organize a credit association for the purpose of serving the stockmen, the cattlemen, and the sheepmen of that State, the group bankers fought the organization of this credit association, so that they were unable to establish one to serve the stockmen and cattlemen of that State.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, the demand for more power, of course, is a human instinct, and we need not wonder that men who have a great deal of it want more; but the penalty of giving them more power may be more than the country is able to bear. I can think of nothing worse befalling the country than to have credit centralized in a few places.

I know that the opposition says there is not much danger, but there are States where the branch banks control the whole situation. They not only control the banking situation; they control the politics of the State. No one denies that. The power of propaganda is a remarkable thing.

HOLDING COMPANIES

The new system of banking in the Northwest, commonly referred to as chain, is, of course, the group system of banking, controlled by the holding companies. It has been quite a problem with this committee to know what to do with this new system of banking, which had no foundation in law or in experience. The committee was of the view that strict regulations should be enforced, but reached the conclusion that it was impossible then to enforce very strict regulations. They did not want to assume the responsibility for important changes in times like these.

The bill, therefore, carries a provision which in effect legalizes this new system of banking, but throws some restriction in the way of further expansion of the system.

There are only three important provisions in the bill relating to this new system of banking:

First, it is legalizing; next, it provides that the holding company shall be examined, same as a bank; and third, it provides for the publication of statements after examination. The light of publicity will be turned on, but really nothing else of any importance is provided for.

The provision about adding to the surplus after three years will probably be neutralized by the fact that losses may be charged against the surplus.

The new system has saved some banks from failure. They sold a good deal of the stock in the corporation or holding company during the boom period. They sold such stock at high prices; the public bought freely. A large sum was accumulated. The examination will no doubt show that a large part of this money has been used to take up bank losses that had to be charged off. This was hard on the new stockholders. But it was helpful to the depositors. Unfortunately we find that sometimes the depositor was also a stockholder.

One of the representatives of the Northwest group banks first took the position that branch banking was not a desirable thing, but a year later, when the bill was still before the committee, took the opposite view.

I am frankly of the opinion that the advice we have received from bankers has been so conflicting and so confusing that it has not been of material aid to the committee.

Second, permit the New York banks to continue their affiliates, the back door to bad banking. They said, it is true, that they wanted that privilege under reasonable regulations, but that they wanted to continue them.

The committee is trying to get them separated. There is a provision in the bill to separate them in the course of three years. Many of the best banks in the country have separated them already. They want to get away from the charge, from the suspicion of bad practice. They want to run clean institutions. They do not have to have that kind of collusion. Others have grown up so close together during these years that it is hard to separate, and they do not want to separate. But the others are those who want to continue an illicit banking business through this back-door method, and the Glass bill provides for its elimination.

The telegrams said three things: First, enlarge the banking system. Second, let the other fellows keep the back-door affiliates. Third, provide liquidating corporations. The latter was a thing that looked good. It is one of the provisions of the Glass bill. I knew, therefore, the number of telegrams the Senator from Virginia would get, and that they would read in this way:

Urge passage of Glass banking bill providing for state-wide branch banking and creation of liquidating corporation for closed banks. Also favor amendment for retention of security affiliates under proper regulation.

I am sorry the Senator from Virginia is not here. Senators noticed that he came into the Chamber yesterday with a pile of telegrams as big as a corn basket.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORBECK. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. I hope that before the Senator gets through with this argument he will request that those telegrams from the Northwest be placed in the RECORD.

Mr. NORBECK. I have already expressed the desire this morning, in opening my remarks, that those telegrams be placed in the RECORD, to show what propaganda will do.

Mr. WHEELER. I think it would be well not only to show what it would do, but to show how this chain-banking system is carried on.

Mr. NORBECK. I will say to the Senator from Montana that I talked to the senders of some of the telegrams. One was a stockholder in a holding company. He said, "NORBECK, you know I have to comply." I answered, "Of course, and I do not blame you." Another one was an employee of a bank, and he said, "You know, NORBECK, that I have to comply." I said, "Of course you do." Another was a borrower in a bank, and he said, "My note is due in 30 days, and I will do anything they ask me to do." Talk about involuntary servitude! These telegrams come by the thousand, by the two thousands, by the three thousands. When we get a nation-wide branch-banking system, the Western Union business will increase tenfold, because they can make every borrower bring pressure on Congress. All they will have to do will be to press a button from the central place.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORBECK. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LA FOLLETTE in the chair). Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. NORBECK. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The lobby on the McFadden banking bill has been referred to. I received telegrams from practically all over my State when that bill was being considered by the Senate, and a committee of bankers came here to put me right on that bill. I took them over to my office and asked them some questions, and found that they did not know what was in the bill, that they had not read it. When I explained what was in the bill, they went home and were not in favor of it.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Dakota yield to me?

Mr. NORBECK. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. I should like to say to the Senator from South Dakota that I found myself in such bitter opposition to this branch-bank feature of the bill that I wondered whether I might be prejudiced in some manner. To make sure that I was really voicing the sentiment of my State, I communicated with 200 communities in New York State, a very considerable number, as Senators will see, and while very few, perhaps a dozen, replies came favoring branch banking, the others were united in their opposition, and many of the writers of the communications expressed thoughts far more bitter than I had found in my own mind. Of course, I may say to the Senator, I did not communicate with the "banksters" in New York, the invisible oligarchy controlling the banking institutions of the country. I assume they are in favor of the bill. But when I talk with unit bankers, with patrons of unit bankers, and those who have an interest in localities, I find, as I have indicated, almost unanimous opposition to this feature of the bill. I am confident that the sentiment in my State is overwhelmingly in opposition to that particular feature.

I do wish, however, to press the matter I spoke of a moment ago, to know whether there are specific things in the bill which are desirable, and whether it is worth while to try to save a part of the bill, or to send it all to destruction. That is the thing I have in mind.

Mr. NORBECK. I thank the Senator. I am going to close in a few minutes, Mr. President. I am thinking of this branch-bank feature as having as one of its purposes the destruction of the State banks. "Unified banking system." That is a beautiful expression; it is an ideal which some have looked forward to; but I am afraid of it as I am of the ideals some people have on some other matters, because it may not work out so well. But we must not forget this, that the State banking system has deposits of about $30,000,000,000, and national banks have deposits of about $20,000,000,000. Why destroy the larger one for the benefit of the smaller? Why standardize? Are we not standardized enough?

Have we not standardized securities? Yes; we have had standards of securities the last two or three years, a thing I referred to before. But let us not have any more of it. Let us not have any more central control. Let us leave the States with some rights. Let the wishes of the people in the States govern, and let us stop this everlasting encroachment, because a system is so powerful that when the public are off guard they push it up a notch here and a notch there. It is like Tennyson's Brook:

> Men may come and men may go,
> But I go on forever.

So with a system. If permitted to make an advance, they are encouraged to make more demands, and they will make more demands on various pretexts.

I am one of those who believe that the great danger of the unified system is the destruction of the State bank, and that that will come about as the result of the branch-banking system, although apparently free competition is permitted. But it is hard competition. It tends to destroy.

There are other plans which are possible. Who would have thought that the big banking centers and the big industrial centers would be here advocating more Government control of banking? Who would have thought they would be here advocating Government in business, as I have shown they have done already. But I am of the opinion that there is an organized movement on foot to guarantee national-bank deposits.

There is an organized movement on foot for the guaranteeing of deposits of national banks for the purpose of bringing on a unified banking system, to make it impossible for the State banks to exist. I might agree to a bank guaranty law soundly made, started in normal times, when there was stability of values. I do not consider that unsound. But I think it is unsound to go in and take up the other fellow's losses. I think it unsound to put bank losses on the taxpayers at this time, and I think it is an awful hardship on those sections of the country which have had bank losses for them to take up bank losses elsewhere. But, above all things, I am fearful of the purpose of the guaranty law, not as urged by some, for many Members of the Congress advocate it honestly and candidly, and want to bring on a better condition. But I have no doubt that those who want to bring about a unified system of banking and destroy State banks are getting back of the system for the purpose of doing that, and are the very people who always fought a bank guaranty law.

I thank the Senate for its attention.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I had not expected to discuss this subject, and I will take just a few minutes to consider section 19 of the bill. I have always been in sympathy with the local unit banks. I have always wanted to see them prosper. The small country bank, located in a remote community, more or less, has been a very important and effective factor in accommodating the needs of the people in such communities. I have wanted to see them prosper, and I would not undertake to do anything which might harm them, if I could avoid it.

On the other hand, Mr. President, we must recognize that conditions have changed in this country very materially. Now we have improved highways, bringing a community that was formerly 50 miles away from a city and banking accommodations near ample and adequate facilities. We have the telephone and the telegraph and the radio, so that what were formerly rather remote communities are brought next door to the larger institutions in the cities and towns in the metropolitan areas.

It has become almost impossible for these small unit banks to operate successfully. The business goes to the larger banks. The deposits are carried to the larger banks, and the remote banks have not sufficient business, not sufficient deposits, not sufficient resources, to enable them to employ expert bankers, experienced and capable officials in connection with the banking business. Really, the banking business is a profession. The man engaged in banking ought to be a man experienced and trained in that business. Banking is a profession, just as much as law or medicine or engineering is a profession. One difficulty we have is that people have established small banks in various communities who have no banking experience, and who did not understand the business. They could get on very well when times were good and money was abundant and business was booming and prosperous. But when stress has come, when there was a tax on their resources and their skill and their experience and their knowledge, they were unequal to it, and the banks went down.

Let us not forget that many of the depositors in the banks of the country, the widows, the estates, the guardians, the individuals who have trusted the banks and who have put their funds on deposit in the banks for the purpose of safekeeping, have lost enormous sums, all they had, fortunes, life savings, in the last few years.

I sympathize with those people. I feel that whereas we may be deeply concerned about the banking business and want to see the bankers perform and serve the public as they should, yet we should be especially concerned about the depositors, the public. What is best for the public? That is the problem we must consider. What is in the public interest? It is not merely a question of what is in the interest of the bankers, the trust companies, the financial institutions, but what is in the interest of the public which those organizations and institutions are supposed to serve.

Having that in view and having in view the changed conditions, I confess to having somewhat changed my mind about the subject of branch banking. I have always heretofore felt opposed to it. I do not like the idea, as the Senator from South Dakota just mentioned, of centralizing financial strength and power in one or two great institutions in the country. I do not like that idea. We have to put the power somewhere to expand and contract the currency as the commerce and industry of the country require it. It must be put some place. We are tending to put extraordinary power in the Federal Reserve Board. That may not be wise, but it seems to be the only thing we can do. We have to vest it in some agency of the Government. That board is supposed to be nonpolitical, nonpartisan, and to be composed of widely experienced financiers of the country, patriotic as well as skillful. If we can not trust them, we can not trust anyone. That is the way it seems to me.

The small unit local banks serving in small communities, it seems to me, in the inevitable trend of events will gradually disappear. We can not help it. They will be unable to engage sufficient experience and skill in their management and to pay sufficient salaries to command that sort of management. The money of the communities where they exist will be gradually drifting to the larger centers, to the larger banks. It seems to me they are being eliminated, and we can not help it. I regret very much to see it. I do not want to hurt them and I do not want to harm them in any way, but we must recognize conditions as they are. As I said, our first duty is to look to the public interest.

Speaking of telegrams, I have had any number of them as other Senators have, by the dozens and dozens opposing section 19 of the bill. I have had them from State banks in my State, which does not permit branch banking. Florida does not allow branch banking. Under the provisions of the bill now before us that provision of the State laws would be overcome and branch banking would be allowed in accordance with this bill as to banks under Federal jurisdiction. At the same time Florida has the right, of course, to change her own laws to meet new conditions, and will have to change her laws to permit branch banking if she sees fit to do it. There is nothing compulsory about it, of course.

There is nothing compulsory about establishing branch banks. They are to be established in the same way as original banking institutions are established. Only where they are needed, where there is a demand for them, will they be established. They will be under control, they will be capitalized. The Senator said something about capital not being increased where a branch bank is established. The bill expressly takes care of that and provides that "the aggregate capital of every banking association and its branches shall at no time be less than the aggregate minimum capital required by law for the establishment of an equal number of national banking associations situated in the various places where such association and its branches are situated," and then there is a provision that "No such association shall establish a branch outside of the city, town, or village in which it is situated unless it has a paid-in and unimpaired capital stock of not less than $500,000." Under the laws of the State of Florida and of other States, banks can be established now with a capital of $10,000. I submit that is not adequate capital for any bank, and I do not care whether it is a State bank or what kind of a bank it is.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. Does the Senator understand that particular clause in the bill to mean a banking association with an unimpaired and paid-in capital stock of not less than $500,000 may establish just as many branches as it wishes throughout the State?

Mr. FLETCHER. No; I do not. The application must be passed upon favorably first by the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. With the approval of the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes; the applications have to be approved by the Federal Reserve Board, just as the Comptroller of the Currency approves the establishment of a bank anywhere.

Mr. COPELAND. I want to be very clear about it. I asked the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] yesterday, and I am repeating the question now. If the Federal Reserve Board should agree that a $500,000 capitalization was sufficient, then that association could establish an unlimited number of branches with the approval of the board. Is that right?

Mr. GLASS. An unlimited number of branches?

Mr. COPELAND. Yes; with the approval of the board.

Mr. GLASS. Yes; just as an unlimited number of national banks can be established to-morrow with the consent of the Comptroller of the Currency.

Mr. FLETCHER. The provision reads:

> A national banking association may, with the approval of the Federal Reserve Board, establish and operate new branches—

And so forth. There may be some danger that the board would approve unwise and unnecessary branches, but that is not at all likely. I think the tendency will be rather the other way, to restrict the establishment of branches.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. FLETCHER. Certainly.

Mr. GLASS. As the Senator from Florida indicated a while ago, with each establishment of a branch the parent bank would have to increase its capital to the extent that would be required for the establishment of an independent unit national bank.

Mr. FLETCHER. That is what I meant to say, and that is what the bill provides. I want to be absolutely fair. This is a controversial question, and there is room for argument on both sides. I am going to ask to have inserted in the RECORD at this point a typical telegram sent to me by E. C. Stuart, president of the Lake Wales State Bank, stating their opposition to that feature of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The telegram is as follows:

LAKE WALES, FLA., May 9, 1932.

Senator DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Washington:

We do hope you will look carefully into any bill proposing a change in the banking laws. As you know, the national banks are located principally in the populous centers, while the State banks are scattered over the rural sections, and their problems are very different but should not be in conflict. We believe any thoughtful unprejudiced authority will agree that the State banks render important service in the conduct of the Nation's business and have a right to live. We do not fear group banking. We are willing to face legitimate competition, but branch banking is not legitimate competition in our opinion, and if the proposal to establish branch banking becomes a law it will be a fatal blow to State banks. If the laws governing the Federal reserve system had not deprived its members of the right to make a legitimate charge for legitimate services we would have been members of it from the beginning, but we can't pay interest on our deposits and keep the required reserve where it bears no interest. We can't incur 75 per cent of the cost of operating the bank, getting and keeping the accounts of our customers, and transfer their balances any and every where without making some charge for it. We believe it detrimental to the best interest of the country to support a measure that would further abridge the rights of the State and have for its ultimate purpose the concentration of wealth and power in the hands of the few.

LAKE WALES STATE BANK,
E. C. STUART, President.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have similar telegrams from other State banks. As bearing on the same subject I think it well to have inserted in the RECORD at this point a letter which I have received from Mr. C. B. Axford, editor of the American Banker, 32 Stone Street, New York, dated May 7. He discusses the whole subject, presenting all the argument and all the facts that could be stated, it seems to me, in opposition to branch banking. I ask that the letter may be inserted in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

NEW YORK, May 7, 1932.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

HONORED SIR: Within a few weeks now, as a Member of the most representative governing body on earth, you will have the opportunity of signing the death warrant of your home-town banks.

You may not clearly realize it; but if you vote for the Glass banking act of 1932, with its degenerative branch-banking provisions, your local banks are doomed.

Are you for or against such a prospect?

You will be told the half truth that branch banking is necessary to make our banking system safer. The dubious examples of Great Britain and Canada, where "there have been no bank failures," will be pointed to as convincing "evidence" that branch banking is safer than unit banking. Heaven help these United States if your good sense does not cause you to smile a little.

We thought new-era economics fell ill in 1929, died in 1930, and were buried forever in 1931.

But enough unfortunately still lives of the errors of 1929 to tempt you with the half-truth arguments that branch banking is better for your people.

Half truths indeed!

For will these branch-bank survivors of the era of error tell you the other half of the story of branch banking—the discredited half?

No banks have failed in Great Britain and Canada? What is the crash of the British gold standard but the greatest bank failure of history, in which the unwieldiness of the branch-banking system was a major cause?

BRITISH AND AMERICAN BANK LOSSES COMPARED

No losses in bank failures in Great Britain? What else is the fact that the pound sterling dropped in purchasing power from $4.85 to $3.25 in gold, silver, or wheat, or other commodities almost overnight?

Owners of British bank deposits worth nearly $12,500,000,000 found nearly a third, i. e., $4,000,000,000—I estimate—wiped out overnight. With all our losses in this country's bank suspensions, no such figure as this will ever be reached. Of our $56,000,000,000 in deposits, only some $5,000,000,000 has been tied up for liquidation in bank failures, and less than a third of this will be seen to be lost when the liquidation of our suspended banks is completed.

A little more than a billion lost to Americans in unit banking, or about 4 per cent, while Britishers have lost $4,000,000,000, or about 30 per cent. And the end of British currency depreciation is not yet!

Meanwhile millions of Americans in the vast majority of our banks have 100 per cent of their money on deposit—safe, available—theirs when they need it most, and it is worth more to them than ever before in buying power, a genuine reward for their thrift.

Branch banking was inevitably a factor in the breaking of the Bank of England. Mismanagement of British public finances was paralleled by a banking system in which deflation could not be localized, as it has been in the United States. The pyramid of centralized banking and finance could only be readjusted by the disaster of currency revaluation.

Why substitute any step toward this discreditable system for the safety which 20,000 unit banks have given 120,000,000 Americans?

This is the dark side of the "no bank failure in England or Canada" argument.

FRENCH-GERMAN BREAKDOWNS OF BRANCH BANKING

Similar disasters have overtaken the French and German branch-banking systems. Branch banks with more than 200 branches have closed in France, quite exploding the idea over there that branch banking is failure proof, while other branch systems have had to be helped by the French Government. In Germany the centralized branch-banking system has broken down entirely, and is now almost wholly subsidized by the German Government. (See current April edition of The National Sphere, Washington, D. C., under Failure of Branch Banking in Germany.)

BRANCH BANKING MEANS CENTRALIZATION AND INCREASE OF WALL STREET DOMINANCE

However, the dismal example of the failure of branch banking in the British Empire, France, and Germany is only one of the full truths which should make you hesitate a long time before you attempt to justify the octopus idea to your constituents.

What is to be the effect upon your communities when a lending policy rationed from Wall Street dictates the uses to which the funds saved by your people shall be put?

Make no mistake. This is what the advocates of branch banking were aiming toward in 1926 when they "strengthened" the banking system with the branch-banking privilege for the first time. It is what they are aiming at now.

Do you want your communities starved for credit? Oh, we know that your British and Canadian branch bankers deny that their systems work that way. But they do not tell you that in a section of Alberta the dairymen are using creamery checks for money and that in many parts of Canada, where there is still hope for local expansion, a substantial body of public opinion thinks highly of the unit-banking system of the United States.

COUNTRY-BANK MANAGEMENT COMPARES FAVORABLY WITH FINANCIAL CENTERS

After our experiences of 1929–1931 we should have no illusions about city-bank management being safer per se than small-town banking. The hundreds of millions of dollars—the figure for charge-offs for 19 large banks in the last 12 months is $207,310,634—lost by New York City banks alone should serve as evidence that city-bank management has much to learn. Only the fortuitous accident of huge stock-market profits through sale of their shares at boom prices gave these city banks capital resources to stand the losses that they have announced to their shareholders. And hundreds of unfortunate country banks will testify that they lost most heavily, where they could least afford it, in bonds recommended for their vital secondary reserve accounts by their big-city correspondents.

The 18,000 or 19,000 small-town banks of this country which have managed their affairs so well as to ride the storms of the times unshaken are open challenges to the superiority of city-bank management.

Many of the smaller banks that failed are ghastly victims of the investment advices and called loans given them by city banks.

Yet all but a few of these 18,000 or 19,000 good small-town banks are doomed as surely as the branch-banking illusion gains ground.

Inevitably any further extension of branch banking means an irretrievable step toward putting the key banking resources of your community more at the disposal of the big financial centers and the stock markets. There is no alternative.

How easy and inevitable you will make the administration of your State's banking from Wall Street if you vote to permit national banks to have branches everywhere in every State.

Do you, Mr. Member of Congress, want this?

Your vote on the Glass bill, as long as it contains the present branch-banking provisions, will be the only answer your constituents need.

In the solid faith of 96 years of service to the banking profession that independent banking is better banking,

Faithfully yours,

C. B. AXFORD,
Editor American Banker.

Mr. FLETCHER. To-day I am receiving dozens and dozens of telegrams and letters from national banks and from State banks in my State, and from other States, favoring branch banks, approving of the idea, and asking me to support the Glass bill just as it is, section 19 and all other provisions included.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. FLETCHER. Certainly.

Mr. WAGNER. Because I know the Senator has given much thought to the question, I would like to get his view as to the fairness of certain portions of section 5 of the bill. The Senator remembers that in 1917, I think it was, the Federal reserve act was amended so as to invite into membership the State banks. In that provision of the law it was stated that they should continue to enjoy all the charter rights which they then enjoyed under the State law. To me that seems a sort of promise made to the State banks that when they became members they would continue to enjoy those charter rights.

Under section 5 of the pending bill restrictions are now imposed or there is a prohibition of privileges which they now enjoy under their State charter. It does not seem to me that is a fair provision.

Mr. FLETCHER. To what particular provision does the Senator refer? The provision is:

Nothing herein contained shall prevent any such member bank from establishing and operating branches in the United States.

Mr. WAGNER. I had not in mind the branch-banking feature. I refer particularly to section 5, on page 8:

State member banks shall be subject to the same limitations and conditions with respect to the purchasing, selling, underwriting, and holding of investment securities and stock as are applicable in the case of national banks under paragraph seventh of section 5136 of the Revised Statutes, as amended.

Some of those rights the banks enjoy under their charters from their respective States. Under the law which we enacted we said to them, "You may join this system and continue to enjoy these charter rights." It seems to me, unless there is some very definite explanation for it, that it is a sort of a breach of a promise in now depriving them by prohibition law of the exercise of those charter rights.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think the Senator will admit that the State member banks, when they come to enjoy the rights and privileges under the Federal reserve system, must be subject to the same regulation as the regular member banks in the system.

Mr. WAGNER. But they are not at the present time.

Mr. GLASS. Oh, yes; they are at the present time; and they are required to be under the existing statute and under the original Federal reserve act. It was meant that they should enjoy their charter rights where not in conflict with the rules and regulations established by the Government for national member banks.

Moreover, the Senator from New York has not related this provision of the law to the other provision of the law to which it refers. It refers to another provision of the Revised Statutes, which is amended by section 14 of the bill, stating that their operations "hereafter" must be such operations as the Federal Reserve Board shall determine by rules and regulations adopted.

Mr. WAGNER. If the Senator from Florida will indulge me for another moment——

Mr. FLETCHER. Certainly.

Mr. WAGNER. I do not know what the Senator means by the intention of the original Federal reserve act. The Senator from Virginia is a greater authority upon that subject than anybody I know of, but the act itself simply says that they may join and continue to enjoy their charter rights under the State charter. That is as I recall the language of the act. If now we prohibit them from enjoying some of those charter rights granted to them by the States, we are to that extent, it seems to me, breaking with these banks the promise that was originally made by statute. Am I correct about the wording of the act?

Mr. GLASS. As a matter of fact, if the Senator from Florida will permit me——

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. When the Federal reserve act was enacted there had not grown up and expanded to a tremendous degree what are now known as bank affiliates, investment affiliates, with their consequent abuses, and, as former Solicitor General Lehmann points out, with their irregular and illicit transactions. We are now proposing in this bill to deal with this Frankenstein in banking, and we are saying that hereafter State member banks shall be upon the same plane of equality and shall be subject to the same restrictions that apply to national member banks. That involves no violation of faith whatsoever with State member banks. If there be any State member bank that is not willing to comply with that requirement of the law, it is its privilege to get out of the system.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President——

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. The case which I have in mind, which was communicated to me, was a case in which an affiliate was actually in existence at the time the statute was passed by Congress and developed by this particular bank. Under the amendment of 1917 we said to that bank, unless I am mistaken about the language of the act—and perhaps the Senator will read it——

Mr. GLASS. Here is the act.

Mr. WAGNER. Very well; if the Senator will read it, it may clear up the point.

Mr. GLASS. Note the qualifications, if the Senator please:

> Subject to the provisions of this act and to the regulations of the board made pursuant thereto, any bank becoming a member of the Federal reserve system shall retain its full charter and statutory rights as a State bank or trust company, and may continue to exercise all corporate powers granted to it by the State in which it was created, and shall be entitled to all privileges of member banks.

Mr. WAGNER. I think that carries out what I said.

Mr. GLASS. I do not think so.

Mr. WAGNER. A promise was made subject to certain regulations.

Mr. FLETCHER. And subject to the provisions of the act.

Mr. WAGNER. Now, it is proposed to go further.

Mr. GLASS. And subject to the reservation of the act that Congress reserved the right to alter or amend it at any time it might please. That is the right that we are proposing to exercise.

Mr. WAGNER. There is no use of my quarreling over the question of interpretation, but I do not agree with that interpretation at all.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, of course the Senator from New York is not only a distinguished and able Senator here but he comes from the judicial bench, and I can see how there might be some difficulty in satisfying him on that subject. I will not attempt to argue the case now, because I have other questions to discuss, and that might lead to unlimited debate. At any rate, it must be conceded that the Congress has power over all the national banks that are members of the Federal reserve system as well as over all the State banks that are becoming members or have become members or may become members of that system. I can not conceive that Congress would be justified in admitting State member banks and allowing them to have certain rights and privileges because of State laws that the national banks which are members of the system do not possess under the Federal statute. That would be a clear discrimination in favor of State banks that might become members. It might permit them to do what no other members of the system could do. All members of the system should be controlled by the same laws. I have not heard of any particular complaint—perhaps the Senator from New York has—that any of the State member banks are being denied any rights that they claim to exercise under State law by reason of this provision in this bill. Anyway, I think that any State bank becoming a member of the Federal reserve system must know, must have known at the time, and must always have known that it is subject to the jurisdiction of Congress just as are the national-bank members of the system. We must retain the same control over all the member banks of the system. Of course, if there is any right or privilege they have under a State law which they claim is being taken away from them by this statute, as the Senator from Virginia suggests, they have a perfect right to withdraw and get out of the system; but, so long as they remain in the system, State member banks must be subject to the same control and regulation to which the national member banks in the system are subject.

I was saying, Mr. President, that I had received to-day numbers of telegrams not only from Florida but from other portions of the country, and, contrary to the telegrams received yesterday, strongly favoring the branch-bank provision, they are urging the support of this bill just as it is. They favor the bill with section 19 in it. I think it is a very important piece of legislation, and I think Congress ought to enact it at this session. It is needed for the good of the country. The bankers need it. Some of them, as indicated by the testimony before the committee, did not seem to realize just what they themselves needed. They changed their views and attitude on various questions from time to time, but they have come to the conclusion that the financial situation of this country and the economic conditions prevailing are such that they need this proposed legislation.

One point I make with reference to branch banking is that, in my judgment, it will improve the safety of the deposits; it will safeguard and better protect depositors than they have been protected in the past. That is indicated by the figures. I have here a statement from the Federal Reserve Board under date of January 4, 1932, which states that in the year 1931 the total number of suspensions was 2,290 involving deposits of $1,759,000,000. The national banks which failed numbered 410, with deposits of $173,000,000. The State bank members of the Federal reserve system which failed numbered 108, with deposits of $302,000,000. The nonmember banks of the number which suspended were 1,772, with deposits of $984,000,000.

Those are the small unit State banks which are not in the system. It was stated this morning that the number would run up to quite a large figure, but that the amount on deposit, the volume of their business, was the main thing to consider. Very well, out of 2,290 failures in 1931, 1,772 were State banks, composed largely of what are called unit banks, and the amount of deposits in those banks was $984,000,000. I can not see but what that is a very considerable sum to be involved.

The depositors of this country in 1931, many of them poor people with from $5 up to $500 perhaps on deposit, lost practically $2,000,000,000, the figure being $1,759,000,000 as of January, 1932. Some of this may come back in small dividends, running over long periods. We must do something to remedy that situation, and I believe we will strengthen the banking system, we will make it more safe for the depositors, if we will permit the establishment of branch banks. They will have back of them the capital that is required. We have in this bill increased the capital required of national banks. Under this bill we are not dealing with the little banks with $10,000 capital such as are now located in various parts of the country and to which the people carry their money in small amounts for deposit on which they try to do business. They ought not to be banks at all; they ought never to have been established with any such capital, in my judgment. The branch banks will have back of them ample capital, expert management, and resources that will accommodate the communities where now the small unit banks are unable to do so.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. DILL. The Senator has given us the figures as to the number of State banks which failed as compared to the member banks of the Federal reserve system which failed. Has the Senator made any compilation to show what percentage of the State banks that failed were in States that have branch banking now as compared to the number of failures in States that do not now have branch banking?

Mr. FLETCHER. I think most of them are in States that permit branch banking, because my recollection is there are only comparatively few States that do not permit branch banking.

Mr. DILL. Then, the branch-banking system has not prevented failures; the branch-banking system has proven ineffective to prevent failures, and they are as common in States where branch banking is permitted as in States where branch banking is not permitted?

Mr. FLETCHER. Does the Senator refer to branch banking carried on by State banks in the States?

Mr. DILL. Yes.

Mr. FLETCHER. In that case, that is because the States have generally only required $10,000 in order to capitalize a bank. They are small institutions.

Mr. DILL. But the Senator is proposing that by Federal statute we shall give the banks members of the Federal reserve system such power that we will, in effect, bludgeon the States into adopting branch banking everywhere. That is what the effect of it is.

Mr. FLETCHER. I differ with the Senator there. My idea is to strengthen the system, to require increased capital and increased resources for the branches under this plan, as authorized by the Federal Reserve Board, which will make the business safe and more active. That is my notion about it.

Mr. DAVIS and Mr. BLAINE addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield first to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator a moment ago referred to section 19. Do I understand that under section 19 any bank in the State of Pennsylvania having a capital of $500,000 can establish branch banks in any community throughout the State?

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes; with the consent of the Federal Reserve Board, and provided it supplies sufficient capital, just as if another bank were being established.

Mr. DAVIS. Then, the following paragraph, being paragraph (d), I do not quite understand. It says:

> (d) The aggregate capital of every national banking association and its branches shall at no time be less than the aggregate minimum capital required by law for the establishment of an equal number of national banking associations situated in the various places where such association and its branches are situated.

Does that mean that a branch bank must have a capital equal to that of the banking houses that are already established in that community?

Mr. FLETCHER. No; equal to the capital of a new institution. For instance, suppose the law requires a bank to have $100,000 capital before it can be chartered and open up and do business; and suppose a large bank wishes to establish branches in different parts of the State. It must supply $100,000 capital for each of those branches just as if it were establishing a new bank. Each branch must be capitalized to the same extent as if it were a new institution.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL] made an inquiry of the Senator from Florida. Let me call the Senator's attention to the fact that according to the report of the Federal Reserve Board of December, 1930, there are only 10 States which authorize state-wide branch banking, and that in 2 of those States 2 of the most serious failures occurred. A whole line of banks went down. There are only 12 States which permit branch banking in restricted locations; and in 2 of those States, as the Senator will recall the testimony before our committee, 48 banks belonging to one of these groups went to smash in one day.

I rather assume that in the face of this report and the facts which I expect to develop, there really is nothing to the contention that bigness means strength in banking. It may mean weakness.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am much obliged to the Senator. That supplies information which I did not have in my mind at the time; but it rather meets the argument of the Senator from Washington by showing that branch banking in the States has not been as successful as he supposed it might be. That is to say, the failures that have taken place are very largely in States that did not allow branch banking, because only 11 or 12 States permit it. I had an impression that most of the States did permit branch banking, but it seems not.

Notwithstanding the restrictions as to branch banking, failures have been taking place all over the country. The number of national banks is 6,480 and the number of State banks 21,500. Of course, when we count the number of failures we expect to find more among the State banks, but according to this report from the Federal Reserve Board the deposits in these local State banks outside of the system amounted to $954,000,000 last year.

That is a serious thing. People are not so much interested in interest or returns or advantages of a bank as they are in the one thing—they want it to be safe. That is what they want and that is what they ought to have.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, will the Senator tolerate another interruption on that very point?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida further yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BLAINE. I want to beg the Senator's pardon. It was not my purpose to criticize or question the information, but I find upon an analysis of the Federal Reserve Bulletin of April, 1932, that in the 11 years preceding—that is, 1921 to 1931, both inclusive—the total amount of deposits in banks that go through liquidation after deducting the amount of deposits with respect to both classes where the banks were reorganized is about the same for nonmember banks as for member banks. In fact, the difference is less than half a million dollars. I have made a calculation, and I shall be glad to give the information a little more extensively when I discuss the matter.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am much obliged to the Senator. That bears on that subject.

I am anxious to close, but I will refer to one thing further.

Speaking about States that do not permit branch banking, what happens there? The national banks, contrary to what I have always thought was not allowable until I began to inquire into the matter and find that it has been established as a general practice, organize these holding companies, and then they establish what in effect is a branch in any portion of the State that they like. Although the State law does not permit branch banking, the national banks are doing that thing under the name of affiliates. They organize a holding company, and then they establish local banks in various parts of the State under the name of the parent bank—the national bank of such and such a locality. They give the name of the affiliate the name of the bank, adding the name of another locality, and they are organizing these affiliates and are doing a banking business in various communities of the States which do not permit branch banking. They are doing it under that authority and power which the Senator from Virginia has claimed were contrary to law as laid down by the Solicitor General, but they are doing it.

So, when we provide in this bill for branch banking, we are not adding to the privileges of national banks in the States where no branch banking is permitted. They are doing that thing under the name of affiliates to-day, and I think it is better to have them real, legitimate branches. In the case of affiliates, the depositors have no protection beyond the organization there, which is made up generally of clerks of the parent bank, and it has not the double liability and protection that would attach to a branch bank.

The system now in practice in the States where branch banking is not permitted, and in other States as well—they do it everywhere—is to establish these affiliates, which are much weaker than the branch banks would be. They have not the responsibility back of them, they have not the resources back of them, and they are not as adequate as a branch would be. So that we are not harming anybody here. We are benefiting the whole system and benefiting the public by permitting the establishment of branches instead of the organization of affiliates in which they now indulge.

I think that in those cases these affiliates will have to separate from the parent bank within three years, anyhow. They will be converted into branches. The banks that organized the affiliates would prefer to have them as branches, and this bill would allow that. I think that would improve the system. .We would get rid of a lot of affiliates in States where branches are not allowed and in States where they are allowed by providing for the establishment of branch banks; and, altogether, I think it would improve the situation generally.

I feel very sincerely that this bill is a very important bill and that it ought to pass the Congress as speedily as possible.

INCREASE OF FIRST-CLASS POSTAGE

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, John Howie Wright, editor of the Postage Magazine, of New York City, released to the press to-day a statement in which he took issue with the contention of the United States Post Office Department in its claim that an increase of 1 cent per ounce in first-class postage will result in an increased revenue of $134,000,000. Mr. Wright states that, on the contrary, the result of the proposed increase will be a loss in revenue of $50,495,000, because of the diversion of first-class mail to other classes and the inability of business to stand the increased burden of $10 per thousand additional cost which the 1-cent increase will mean.

The entire matter is of such vital importance to the people of the State of New York, as well as to other great centers of the country, that I believe the Members of the Senate should have the advantage of reading the letter which Mr. Wright has addressed to me, and which he wrote in reply to a letter sent to me on the same subject by the office of the Postmaster General on April 29.

I therefore ask that this statement, the correspondence, and the figures attached thereto be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Finance Committee.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance, as follows:

STATEMENT MADE BY JOHN HOWIE WRIGHT, EDITOR OF POSTAGE MAGAZINE, NEW YORK CITY, RELATIVE TO PROPOSED INCREASE IN FIRST-CLASS POSTAL RATES

The attached correspondence and chart reveal that the estimate of $134,000,000 increase in postal revenue as the result of the proposed increase of 1 cent in first-class mail was obtained by using the 1930–1931 postal receipts as the basis of computation. Current postal revenue, however, has decreased between 17 and 20 per cent. Revised figures for 1932 income will show that there has already been a shrinkage of more than a billion and a half pieces. This must be taken into consideration before any estimate can be made on the possible decrease in volume due to increased mailing cost.

Mr. Wright estimates that the total revenue during the fiscal year of 1933 on first-class mail will be $269,339,000 instead of $453,751,000, if the 3-cent rate is approved. Instead of an increase of $134,000,000 in revenue over 1931 volume, he predicts a decrease of $50,000,000.

The correspondence attached, together with accountants' chart of comparative effects, explains in detail the method of arriving at the estimate.

POSTAGE AND THE MAILBAG,
New York City, May 7, 1932.

Hon. ROYAL S. COPELAND,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR COPELAND: I am very glad to have the opportunity of answering the letter from the office of the Postmaster General. I have been connected with mail advertising for over 20 years; with this magazine since 1917. I have watched the growth of the use of the mail service by business men, and I believe that I am qualified to represent the users of the mail in protesting against an inaccurate analysis of fact and figure.

Paragraph (b): Estimate is based upon volume of first-class mail during year ending June, 1931. What has been the shrinkage since then? Every month postal receipts have been showing a drop—even in December, the peak month. Analysis of letter production and printing business, together with a comparison of shrinkage in newspaper and magazine lineage advertising, would indicate a reduction in business (or selling) first-class mail of at least 20 per cent. Possibly more. Mr. Brown could give you the accurate figure. What is the present volume?

Leaving out the $37,500,000 overpaid first-class mail in which there may have been no shrinkage, the normal volume in June, 1931, was $282,334,353. Mr. Brown knows, or should know, that there has been a terrific shrinkage in business mail—in sales letters. At the present rate of business it is safe to say that mailings are off 20 per cent, representing in round figures about $56,000,000. This leaves a balance from above of $226,334,353 of present yearly first-class flow, or in round figures about 11,300,000,000 pieces of first-class mail bearing 2-cent stamps, excluding all the overpaid ounces. Increasing 1 cent per piece, where could Mr. Brown develop $159,000,000 increase?

Paragraph (c): Mr. Brown states that "much" of the advertising matter now being sent first class would be diverted, and yet he figures in paragraph (d) that this would represent 1,200,000,000 letters. Does Mr. Brown know how much of the volume is represented by advertising letters? Close to 70 per cent of the first-class mail is business mail described in brief attached. Does Mr. Brown know that banks will reduce statement mailings by asking depositors to call; public-utility companies will deliver by meter readers; acknowledgments will go by post card instead of letters? These are simple routine business economies. But does Mr. Brown know from contact with mail selling, the place of the letter in selling? Does he realize that there are approximately 2,500 commercial organizations in the United States producing personal form letters for clients? It can safely be estimated that around 40 per cent of first-class mail is selling literature (sales letters, inquiry letters, contact letters, follow ups). Mr. Brown can not estimate the loss of volume unless he recognizes the value of the letter to business men and the accepted place of the letter in business (at a carrying charge of $20 per thousand).

Paragraph (d): From our survey of business mail users we know that the "diversion" will be greater than a casual 1,200,000,000 letters. We know one company that has already diverted a schedule of 6,000,000 letters in anticipation of the raise. Another individual company has informed me of 1,000,000 letter diversion. If you can find time, read only a few of the serious letters from our great business mail users giving their estimate of diversion. Mr. Brown will lose one-half or more of the present sales letters.

Forty per cent of the present estimated flow would be four and a half billion pieces. A 50 per cent drop would represent two and a quarter billion pieces taken out of the mail. And we can safely predict that necessary economies in normal business use of the mail (the difference between 40 and 70 per cent) will show another 1,000,000,000 drop. I could show you volumes of evidence to support that claim.

To substantiate this claim we can point out that when third-class rates were raised around 1924 the department lost 1,000,000,000 pieces when the increase in rate for the weight carried was only a small percentage of the fraction of increase which is now threatened in first class, and the effect of the present raise is so much more far-reaching, reaching out to every possible business user of the mail. Third class was at that time largely limited to mail-order houses.

Another example:

The Post Office Department should not forget the experience of the department in increasing the rate on private mailing cards in 1925 from 1 cent to 2 cents, in the belief that whereas they were getting $10,000,000 they would thereafter receive $20,000,000, and the fact that in actual operation, instead of getting $20,000,000 they lost $6,000,000 of the $10,000,000 they had been receiving.

How can Mr. Brown justify, in all fairness, his estimate of 1,200,000,000 shrinkage with his remarks made October 18, 1930, before the Post Office Appropriation Committee in connection with second-class mail?—

"Increasing the second-class rates will not increase revenue, but will simply drive the business to other carriers that will carry it more cheaply than we will."

Does Mr. Brown think that business mail users (70 per cent the volume of first class) will stand an additional tax of $10 per 1,000 without a murmur or without trying to find a substitute? Their substitute can be third class, postal cards, or private distributing companies which are already being organized. From these facts, is our estimate of three and a quarter billion decrease too exaggerated? I do not think so. Our future annual flow is now down to, roundly, 8,000,000,000 pieces.

Now, let us multiply this figure by 3-cent postage rather than multiply present volume by 1 cent. What happens? The 8,000,000,000 pieces produce $240,000,000, which is just $14,000,000 more than present flow estimates from straight 1-ounce pieces. This difference can sink lower and very likely will sink below present volume if the experience in postal cards is any criterion and if business is made more chaotic by intolerable taxation.

Paragraph (e): We are glad that Postmaster General Brown realizes the possibility of shrinkage below 1931 volume. Why does he leave out the 1932 experience? Does Mr. Brown realize that this $10 per thousand tax for doing business by mail will make business even more chaotic?

Does Mr. Brown realize that a reduction of at least three and a quarter billion pieces of first-class mail means three and a quarter billion less envelopes to be manufactured, sold, distributed, typed, stamped, and mailed? Three and a quarter billion inclosures, involving the time of dictation, transcribing, printing, providing wages to stenographers, typographers, artists, engravers, employees engaged in manufacturing ink, type, and all the allied trades?

Will this help business? Will this increase the postal volume?

Your correspondent has not overlooked the fact that "overweight" mail will be even more unjustly taxed. We also realize that the extra tax of 1 cent each will make C. O. D. envelope mailings (Postal Laws and Regulations, 384½) practically prohibitive. We know that even now all major companies are taking steps to eliminate overpaid mail. Mr. Brown's figure of 1,875,000,000 ounces will shrink in half. Instead of $36,000,000 revenue, he will be fortunate to get, at 3 cents, a $25,000,000 total.

Add this to our new figure of $240,000,000 and you have $265,000,000 total first-class revenue for 1933, which is a far cry from the 1931 volume of $319,834,353.

That is why, Senator COPELAND, the users of the mail have fought to be heard. We have sought to show that it is unfair to the Senators and to the public to let go unchallenged the Post Office Department's promised increase of revenue of $135,000,000, when it is a fact that first-class dollar revenue will be lower under 3-cent postage than it is now.

The impressive figure of $135,000,000 is fictional.

If the rate is passed, it will be another deterrent of business recovery; a nuisance tax against the source of getting business. It will be an injustice against business.

I want to thank you for the evidence of your sincere interest in knowing the facts. And I pledge you my earnest support if you can aid in stopping this ill-considered legislation.

Sincerely yours, JOHN H. WRIGHT, Editor.

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., April 29, 1932.

Hon. ROYAL S. COPELAND,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR COPELAND: The Postmaster General has asked me to acknowledge receipt of your letter of April 26, transmitting a communication addressed to you by Mr. John Howie Wright, editor Postage and Mail Bag, New York, N. Y., in which the writer takes exception to the estimate of the Post Office Department as to the amount of additional postal revenue that would result from increasing the letter rate of postage from 2 to 3 cents for each ounce or fraction thereof.

The estimate is essentially based upon the volume of postal business handled during the fiscal year 1931. During that fiscal year the computed total revenue from letter mail was $319,834,353.01. Assuming no diversions to other classes of mail and no loss in business, a 50 per cent increase in the letter rate of postage would produce $159,917,176.50 additional revenue.

But such an increase in the letter rate would inevitably result in diversions and loss of business. Much of the advertising matter now being sent out under cover of sealed envelopes at first-class rates would no doubt be diverted to the third class or to postal cards or post cards, and in all probability a 3-cent letter rate would have the effect of reducing materially the number of business letters written, perfunctory acknowledgments, follow-up letters, and good-will letters.

In computing the probable increase in postal revenues that would result from the 3-cent rate, it was assumed that there would be a reduction of 1,200,000,000 letters, of which 1,000,000,000 would be diverted to postal cards, post cards, or third class, and the remaining 200,000,000 would be lost from the mails. The net increase in revenue in that case would be $133,917,176.50, which was stated in round numbers as $134,000,000.

The accuracy of this estimate depends largely upon whether business generally in the fiscal year 1933 may approximate that of the fiscal year 1931. To whatever extent it may be more or less favorable the amount of increased revenue from the proposed 3-cent letter rate may be expected to vary proportionately from the original estimate.

Your correspondent has evidently overlooked the fact that the proposed increase in letter rate is 1 cent for each ounce or fraction thereof, and not simply 1 cent for each letter. In the fiscal year 1931 the postage weight of letter mail in addition to the first ounce was approximately 1,875,000,000 ounces, on which an additional revenue of 1 cent per ounce would have produced $18,750,000 additional revenue.

Mr. Wright's letter to you is inclosed herewith.

Very truly yours,

HAROLD N. GRAVES,
Executive Assistant to the Postmaster General.

Comparative effect of 3-cent postage

PART I

The Post Office Department's own figures, showing basis of computing increased revenue.

All figures based on 1930–31 fiscal year revenues.

Total 1930–31 first-class revenue was	(A)	$319,834,353.01
Deduct all revenue from over 1-ounce mail		$37,500,000.00
Leaves all revenue on straight 1-ounce mail at 2 cents		$282,334,353.01
Deduct Post Office Department's own estimate of shrinkage of 1,200,000,000 pieces due to 1-cent increase		$24,000,000.00
Balance of income at old rate of 2 cents		$258,334,353.01
Reduce to number of straight pieces to be mailed under 3-cent rate		12,916,717,655
Add overweight ounces		1,875,000,000
Total 1-ounce units		14,791,717,655
A 1-cent increase on each piece would gross		$147,917,176.55
Deduct from this the 2-cent loss on each of the 1,200,000,000 pieces withdrawn from first class		$24,000,000.00
Net increase on first class		$123,917,176.55
Add (by Post Office) the 1,000,000,000 pieces estimated as diverted to third class at 1 cent each		$10,000,000.00
Total Post Office estimate of increase	(B)	$133,917,176.55
Post Office estimate of total revenue on first-class mail at 3 cents per ounce (by adding A and B)		$453,751,529.56

PART II

Post Office Department did not correct figure on first-class volume to coincide with current shrinkage. Present volume is about 20 per cent lower than volume in 1930–31 fiscal year.

1930–31 first-class volume	$319,834,353.01
Deduct revenue from over 1-ounce mail	$37,500,000.00
Leaves 1931 figure of revenue on 1-ounce pieces	$282,334,353.01
Less 20 per cent decrease due to current shrinkage in volume of mail	$56,000,000.00
Present volume on straight 1-ounce pieces at 2 cents each	$226,334,353.01
Reduce to number of straight 1-ounce pieces being mailed at the present time—pieces	11,316,717,650

PART III

The advertising industry computes the effect of 3-cent postage by starting with the number of pieces being mailed at present time.

Pieces of straight 1-ounce mail	11,316,717,650
40 per cent of first-class volume is advertising or selling mail. Evidence indicates a 50 per cent decrease, or	[1] 2,263,243,680
Gross volume, in pieces	9,052,973,970
80 per cent of first-class volume is business mail (statements, collections, routine asknowledgments, etc.). Survey indicates a drop of	[2] 1,000,000,000
Net volume	[3] 8,052,973,970
Multiply by 3-cent postage	[4] $241,589,219.10
Add revenue from over 1-ounce mail, which Post Office figured in 1931 as 1,850,000,000 pieces. As current shrinkage is 20 per cent, and as banks and commercial houses will cut down overweight pieces, a 50 per cent reduction is logical	$27,750,000.00
Total revenue under 3-cent postage	$269,339,219.10
Note that Post Office figure for total volume of straight pieces to be mailed under 3 cents after all deductions for reduced use is	12,916,717,655
While it is an actual fact that present 1932 volume of straight pieces at 2 cents, without figuring for future diversion, is only	11,316,717,650
The advertisers place a fair estimate, backed up by evidence, that volume will be reduced by diversion to	8,052,973,970

CONCLUSIONS

Post Office figure of present first-class revenue	$319,834,353.01
Post Office estimate of volume of 3-cent postage	453,751,529.56
Post Office estimated increase over 1931 figures	133,917,176.55
Post Office figure of first-class revenue	319,834,353.01
Advertisers' estimate of 3-cent first-class volume	269,339,219.10
Decrease under 1931 figures	50,495,133.91
Post Office estimate of revenue with 3-cent postage	453,751,529.56
Advertisers' estimate of revenue with 3-cent postage	269,339,219.10
The Post Office has overestimated first-class volume by the sum of	184,412,310.46

The difference lies in the fact that the Post Office used the 1931 figures, and did not count present business shrinkage, together with wholesale diversions, of 3-cent postage enacted.

LEGISLATIVE ANTHROPOLOGY AS APPLIED TO CONGRESS

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an interesting article entitled "Legislative Anthropology as Applied to Congress."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LEGISLATIVE ANTHROPOLOGY AS APPLIED TO CONGRESS—BEING A CHAPTER IN THE SCIENTIFIC STUDY OF MODERN CIVILIZED MAN

(By Dr. Arthur MacDonald, Washington, D. C.)

Legislative anthropology includes the legislative, political (not partisan), sociological, psychological, and physical status of members of a legislature or parliament.

The legislative status is based upon the number of bills, amendments, motions, and resolutions introduced and the number of these reported or passed either house or enacted into law; also upon the frequency of remarks (not length) on the floor, including number of subjects discussed; and also upon the number of appointments and designations. The legislative status is estimated mainly according to the difficulty of bills and resolutions, in passing through the regular legislative stages, up to and including enactment into law.

The political status consists in the political party to which a member belongs and in public offices held and political honors received previous to entering the legislature, also length of service in legislature or parliament.

The sociological and psychological status is concerned with predominant lineage or heredity, place and time of birth (including order of birth), profession, occupation, and degree of education of member previous to entering legislature; also any appropriate psychological tests.

The physical status includes fundamental anthropological measurements of the body, and what is most important, the health or hygienic condition of the member of a legislature.

In addition to the general importance of such data, one purpose is to find whether or not, and if so in what degree, these different statuses are related or depend upon each other and to compare nations as to anthropological status.

LEGISLATURE BEST ORGANIZATION TO REPRESENT COUNTRY

The physical measurements of members of a legislature represent the anthropological status of the whole country better than measurements of any other body of men. More important still, these measurements can be a basis for the health of the nation, one of its greatest assets. The examination of members of a parliament by specialists includes the stomach, heart, lungs, ear, nose, throat, genito-urinary organs, nervous system, skin and hair, blood, and eyes, X-ray and general physical examination, each by a different specialist.

MEMBERS OF CONGRESS AS AN OBJECT OF SCIENTIFIC STUDY

The Members of Congress are not only of special interest politically but scientifically. As chosen servants of the people, they have great importance; for coming from all sections of the United States, they are truly representative, and afford a good opportunity to establish an anthropological status of our country. It would be impracticable to study thousands or more of the adult population in all sections of this country. So, mathematically speaking, for purposes of research we can regard the 500 or more Members of Congress as representing the Nation. If Congress will set the example, it will help other countries to begin similar studies of their legislative bodies, until eventually we can establish a comparative anthropology of modern legislative man, and be able to distinguish between statesmen of different states and nations as to their general legislative and anthropological status. It is also probable that where the physical status of the legislature of a nation or state excels that of another nation or state, the general physical condition of that country or state itself is superior.

In Table 1 are given anthropological measurements of 89 Members of Congress, including length, breadth, and height of head, with estimates of cranial capacity and brain weight; also stature, sitting height, arm reach, chest girth, and weight; also length and width of face and nose. Then physiological measurements were taken, including hand grasp; also disagreeable, uncomfortable, and threshold of pain pressure on the temples; also sociological data, giving educational status, predominant lineage, occupation, and place and time of birth.

SIGNIFICANCE OF BRAIN WEIGHT

In the animal kingdom in at least three-fourths of the cases, and very probably more, the species with the heavier brain show more intelligence, and this is specially striking when we come to man as compared with the lower animals. For as man's intelligence is so much greater than that of the animals, so his brain is correspondingly heavier. Thus in the animals near to man, as the gorilla, the brain weight is from 400 to 500 grams (14 to 17 ounces), while in man it is from 900 to 1,800 (31 to 63 ounces) or more grams, certainly a prodigious rise or, rather, jump, the average for man being from 1,350 to 1,450 grams (47 to 51 ounces).

These comparative brain weights, especially in man, refer to groups and not to individuals; and here let me, once for all, caution the reader as to a very common error; that is, because Congressman A has a heavier brain than Congressman B it does not in the least mean that Congressman A is the more intelligent, but it does seem to mean that a hundred Congressman A's, whose average weight of brain is greater than the average brain weight of 100 Congressman B's, are the more intelligent in at least three-fourths, and probably more, of group instances. In short, it is the general trend in the animal kingdom that brain weight and intelligence go together; there are exceptions, but they are comparatively so few as to prove the rule. But when we come to man, individuals vary so that no conclusion can be drawn as to this or that person. Yet after all is said, a heavy brain, especially in relation to body build or weight, is a favorable sign. The elephant has a weight of brain more than twice that of man, but in relation to his body weight he is as 1 to 500, while man's weight of body is to his brain weight as 36 to 1. The brains of about 100 distinguished persons have been weighed and studied, and in the great majority of cases the weight is distinctly above the average, and here again the exception only tends to confirm the rule, or general trend. Many of the exceptions cited of large brains and little wit are pathological, and are necessarily excluded from consideration, as in the case, for instance, of idiots and imbeciles, some of whom have large brains.

In his study of 20,000 Washington school children some 30 years ago the author found that for each age the average head circumference of the positively bright children was distinctly greater than that of dull children of the same age; and as the numbers were large, this could hardly be accidental.[1]

METHOD OF ESTIMATING BRAIN WEIGHT

After permission for an autopsy is obtained, and as soon after death as possible, and before rigor mortis has set in, each case is measured just as on the living, and then the brain is removed and weighed; then the estimated weight is compared with the actual weight and the difference is noted. In about half of the cases the estimated weight is more than the actual weight, and in the other half less than the actual weight; so that the average of a number of cases of estimated weight can be determined approximately, because the too-muchs and too-littles cancel each other. Thus from outside head measurements of the 18 Members of the delegation from Massachusetts, for instance, their average weight of brain can be found approximately.

In estimating the brain weight of the 89 Members of Congress, from outside measurements of the head, the following equation was used, called the "Lee formula," which gives the cranial capacity and is written:

[(Head length−11)×(head breadth−11)×(head height−11)×.'000337]+406.01. In order to get the weight of brain from the cranial capacity, we use Welcker's formula thus:

WHEN CRANIAL CAPACITY RUNS—

From 1,200	to	1,300	cubic	centimeters	multiply by .91 =	= Brain weight in grams.
From 1,300	to	1,400	cubic	centimeters	multiply by .92 =
From 1,400	to	1,500	cubic	centimeters	multiply by .93 =
From 1,500	to	1,600	cubic	centimeters	multiply by .94 =
From 1,600	to	1,700	cubic	centimeters	multiply by .95 =

To illustrate, let us figure out the brain weight of Congressmen. As, for instance, his length of head is 201 millimeters (8 inches), width of head 152 millimeters (5 inches), and height of head 146 millimeters (5 inches). Applying the equation given above, we have:

[(201−11)×(152−11)×(146−11)×.000337]+406.01=1,625 cubic centimeters (98 cubic inches), which is the cranial capacity of the Congressmen. Looking at Welcher's table above, we find that to obtain the brain weight of one with a cranial capacity of 1,625 cubic centimeters, we must multiply this by .95, which gives 1,543 grams (54 ounces) as the estimated weight of this Congressman's brain. The results for each Member are given in Table 1, column 6.

HOMOGENEITY OF CONGRESS

In anthropological research the more homogeneous the subject matter, the more trustworthy the results. As will be seen from Table 1, column 29, the great majority (63) of the 89 Members of Congress studied have English or Scotch as their predominant lineage, and those with other predominant lineage show a goodly sprinkling of English and Scotch blood.

Doubtless the 89 Members of Congress measured, as well as Congress as a whole, represent successful Americans in their prime of life, as their average age is 53 years (see col. 1, Table 1). It is to be regretted, however, that a larger number were not studied, yet the 89 that were may be regarded as a random sample of Congress as a whole, for they come from almost all sections of our country, as is shown in Table 1.

MEASUREMENTS OF MEMBERS OF CONGRESS BY STATE GROUPS

In Table 2 below the 89 Members of Congress, who were measured by myself personally, are arranged according to the usual geographical divisions by State groups, giving their head measurements, measurements for body build, and strength of hand grasp. Also an estimate of brain weights is given for each State group or geographical division.

The west South Central States—that is, Arkansas, Louisiana, Oklahoma, and Texas—show the greatest stature, 179 centimeters (70 inches), and at the same time the greatest brain weights, 1,571 grams (55 ounces); also the greatest length of head, 198 millimeters (8 inches). The next highest in brain weight, 1,525 grams (53 ounces), is shown by Members from the west North Central States—that is, Minnesota, Iowa, Missouri, North Dakota, South Dakota, Nebraska, and Kansas. These are also high in stature, 177 centimeters. This tends to confirm other studies on larger numbers of a positive correlation of height and brain weight and still higher correlation between length of head and weight of brain. Also the lowest brain weight (1,419 grams, or 49 ounces) has the smallest length of head (191 millimeters, or 7 inches), as indicated in the measurements of the five Members from the Pacific States—that is, California, Washington, and Oregon.

The 13 Members of the east South Central States (Kentucky, Tennessee, Alabama, Mississippi), though having the greatest average brain weight, show the lowest figures for strength of hand grasp (34, 30 kilograms=91, 80 pounds). On the other hand, the five Pacific Coast Members have the greatest hand grasp (76 kilograms=203 pounds) but the lowest brain weight.

TEMPLE PRESSURE MEASUREMENTS OF DISAGREEABLENESS, UNCOMFORTABLENESS, AND THRESHOLD OF PAIN

The instruments used in this study were the usual ones employed in anthropology with the exception of a temple algometer (designed by the author) to measure pain threshold and states up to it.

This algometer consists of a brass cylinder with a steel rod running through one of the ends of the cylinder. This rod is attached to a spring with a marker on the scale; this scale is graded from zero to 4,000 grams (141 ounces). The brass disk is 15 millimeters (one-half inch) in diameter. The whole instrument is 30 centimeters (12 inches) in length.

In using this algometer it is held in the right hand by the experimenter, who stands back of the subject and presses the disk against the right temporal muscle; then he moves in front of the subject, where he can conveniently press the disk against the left temple, or temporal muscle. As soon as the pressure feels the least bit disagreeable, the amount of pressure is read from the scale, as indicated by the marker. The pressure is gradually and slowly increased, the same words are said to each subject in the same manner, and otherwise the psychological part is made as uniform as possible. As soon as the pressure is felt to be the least disagreeable the amount of pressure is read by observing the marker on the scale.

The subject sometimes hesitates to say just when the pressure becomes disagreeable, but this intellectual factor forms part of the experiment. In fact, there are three inseparable elements in this experiment. First, the idea of disagreeable; second, the feeling disagreeable; and, third, the muscle itself; that is, one mental, one sensitive, and one physical element are all combined and do not exist separated. The intellectual part probably depends mainly upon the general idea of disagreeable formed from disagreeable experiences in life; the disagreeable feeling may be influenced by disagreeable pains and physical injuries suffered in the past. The experiment also is affected by the texture of the muscle itself, its thickness and that of the skin over it.

After the amount of pressure feeling becomes the least bit disagreeable it is recorded for each temple. The experiment is again made to find the least pressure necessary to make an uncomfortable feeling. Here also, as in the first experiment, the intellectual, sensitive, and physical factors are combined in their influence on the resultant record. With the threshold of pain the same procedure is followed as in the other experiments for disagreeable and uncomfortable pressure.

INTERPRETATION OF THE PRESSURE EXPERIMENTS

When, for instance, a subject feels a 1,500-gram (53 ounces) pressure a least bit disagreeable and a 2,000-gram (70 ounces) pressure uncomfortable, the difference between these pressures, 500 grams (17 ounces), measures the difference between the disagreeable and the uncomfortable pressure feeling. When the same subject requires 3,000-gram (106 ounces) pressure to have the threshold of pain feeling, the difference between his 2,000-gram (70 ounces) uncomfortable feeling and this 3,000-gram (106 ounces) threshold of pain feeling—that is, 1,000 grams (35 ounces)—measures the difference between these feelings. Since the muscle or physical factor in the experiment is practically constant, the mental and sensitive factors in the two following experiments for uncomfortable and threshold of pain feeling have increasingly greater influence; that is, this psychophysical experiment becomes more psychical, and thus to a certain extent the difference between the idea of disagreeable and that of uncomfortable or of threshold of pain can be measured in grams or ounces.

In general, the amount of pressure required to produce a disagreeable or uncomfortable or threshold of pain feeling varies with the resistance of the subject; that is, the more sensitive the subject the less the pressure required.

BODY BUILD

The body build or frame is obtained by dividing the chest circumference (at the armpits) by the stature. As body build increases, one passes from slenderness to stoutness in build; that is, the chest girth is larger relatively to the height; that is, the frame is broader relative to the stature. When chest circumference is large compared with height, we often call the man "thick set." These terms do not always have exactly the same meaning in actual use, but slenderness and stoutness, or thicksetness, seem most appropriate. Stoutness does not necessarily mean vigor. Circumference has an almost constant relation to chest diameter; its ratio to stature probably serves as the best index of body build. This is preferable to weight, which is quite variable, as compared with chest circumference.

In Table 3 we will first compare in a general way the Members of Congress as to their sensitiveness to least disagreeable, uncomfortable, and threshold of pain pressure on the temporal muscles, and this in relation to their predominant lineage. It will be noted that almost without exception the Members require the least pressure for that considered disagreeable (1,622 grams (58 ounces)) (col. 9) and the most pressure for the threshold of pain (2,261 grams (79 ounces)) (col. 11). It will further be seen that the left temple is more sensitive than the right. In previous studies [1] of both children and adults the author found the same to be true.

MEANING OF CORRELATION COEFFICIENT

If your two hands were exactly alike, the relation between them would be 100, a perfect correlation; but if very nearly alike, say, 97 or 98, though not perfect, the correlation is of a very high degree; that is, very nearly perfect.

If you have, for example, the heights of 1,000 soldiers in one column and their weights in a corresponding column, the question is, What, if any, is the degree of relation between them; that is, are the taller soldiers heavier in weight or not; and if they weigh more, to what extent; that is, what is their correlation coefficient? The method of finding this coefficient is described in statistical works.

RELATION OF DISAGREEABLE PRESSURE TO STRENGTH OF HAND GRASP

In arranging the figures for disagreeable pressure the amounts for each temple were added together and then the result was divided by two, making a single quantity. The figures for hand grasp for each hand were combined to give one figure for the total hand strength of each Member. All these figures are based upon columns 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, and 24 of Table 1. The Pearson correlation coefficient is worked out in Table 4 with body build and brain weight. In applying the same methods to determine the degree of relationship between disagreeable pressure upon the temples and strength of hand grasp, the correlation coefficient for Members of Congress in general (see Table 4, sec. A) is found to be 0.49±0.054. The cause of this substantial relation between disagreeable pressure and strength of hand may be due to the fact that physically strong persons tend to be less sensitive. As Congressmen with a large body build tend to be strong, and as we see (Table 4) the correlation between body build and disagreeable pressure is high, being .64±.042 (see Table 4, sec. B), this confirms still further this idea, that the greater the strength of hand of Members of Congress, the more resistant they are to disagreeable pressure, which suggests less sensitiveness to disagreeable experiences, which might be useful in the vicissitudes of political life.

RELATION OF THRESHOLD-PAIN PRESSURE TO EDUCATIONAL STATUS

We have divided the Members of Congress studied into two classes according to degree of education received in earlier life (Table 1, cols. 25–28); one class are those with university education, and the second class, those with less than university education, as college, high-school, or common-school training. By university education, we mean those who have graduated from college or have been there a year or more and then studied for their profession in some university.

By examining Table 4, section E, it will be found that those Members with university education show an average threshold-pain pressure of 2,082 grams (73 ounces), and those with less education a threshold pain pressure of 2,377 grams (83 ounces). Thus the university-trained Members of Congress studied are more sensitive to the threshold of pain pressure than those with less education by 295 grams (10⅜ ounces). This suggests the idea that the higher the degree of education, the greater is the threshold-pain pressure sensitiveness.

RELATION OF THRESHOLD-PAIN PRESSURE TO PLACE OF BIRTH

We have also divided the Members into two classes—those born in the country and those born in the city—and then found the average of each for threshold of pain pressure. As will be noted from Table 4, section E, the average for those born in the country is 2,274 grams (80 ounces), and for those of city birth, 2,048 grams (72 ounces); that is, those of country birth are less sensitive to the threshold of pain pressure by 226 grams (8 ounces) than those born in the city, which also suggests that country life tends to develop hardihood to be able to endure better that which is physically painful.

As those who live in the country are generally not as highly educated as those who dwell in the city, and as those with university education have just been shown to be more sensitive to threshold-pain pressure than those with less education, the suggestion that country life tends to develop a hardihood to endure better, physical pain is strengthened.

RELATION BETWEEN BODY BUILD AND DISAGREEABLE TEMPLE PRESSURE

In Table 4, section B, are given the means, standard deviations, and correlation coefficients with their respective probable errors, for the relation between body build and disagreeable temple pressure for all 89 Members, and also for Members whose lineage is predominantly English.

There is practically no difference between the average body build of the Members in general and that of those with English lineage, the one being 5,709 and the other 5,715. The correlation coefficient for body build and disagreeable temple pressure is .64±.042 for all the Members and 0.62±0.0709 for those with predominant English lineage. Here also the difference is insignificant. The correlation coefficients are distinctly high.

APPLICATION OF CORRELATION COEFFICIENT TO PREDOMINANT LINEAGE

In column 29 of Table 1 is given the predominant and other lineage of each Member of Congress measured. From Table 3 will be found the number of Members of Congress according to predominant lineage, the English numbering 32, the Scotch 30, the German 8, Norwegian 6, and so on. As already noted, the English and Scotch constitute the great majority for predominant lineage.

In determining the degree of relationship of disagreeable pressure and hand strength, in connection with predominant lineage, by working out the correlation coefficient, we find from Table 4, section A, that those Members with predominant English lineage have a coefficient of correlation of 0.60±0.077, the Scotch a correlation of 0.60±0.074, and those with other lineage combined (24 Members) have a coefficient of correlation of 0.68±0.077. These coefficients all indicate high degrees of correlation between disagreeable pressure and hand strength according to predominant lineage. The average disagreeable pressure for Members of Scotch lineage is 1,771 grams (62 ounces), that for those of English descent 1,532 grams (63 ounces), and those of other lineage 1,520 grams, thus indicating that those with predominant Scotch descent are less sensitive to disagreeable pressure than the English by 239 grams (8 ounces); that is to say, that those with Scotch descent are the most resistant to disagreeable pressure of all, and might suggest a greater hardihood to disagreeable experiences in life.

Why the left temple should be more sensitive than the right may be due to the fact that the great majority of persons are right handed, having more physical activity and consequent blood flow on the right side, feeding the nerves more, and it may be making these more resistant to pain and also to deterioration on the right side. Thus it has been said by dentists that teeth decay more on the left side of the face than on the right.

It appears also that those with the heaviest estimated brain weight tend to resist pressure most, showing more hardihood. In Table 4, section B, this is indicated by the fact that the correlation of body build with brain weight is 0.63±0.043, and the correlation of body build with disagreeable pressure is 0.64±0.042, practically the same and distinctly high correlations. In connection with this, on the other hand, there are those with less brain weight, as in French and Welsh lineage, who show more sensitiveness, as indicated in column 12, Table 3, where all the averages are summed up and averaged.

Those members whose predominant lineage is Dutch, Scotch, English, or Irish show the least sensitiveness in order mentioned.

In distinguishing this pressure feeling as disagreeable and uncomfortable (Table 3) the Dutch show a difference of 812 grams (28 ounces), the Irish 565 grams (20 ounces), and the Welsh 275 grams (9 ounces), which is practically a quantitative measurement of the difference between disagreeable and uncomfortable pressure, as they experience it. To distinguish uncomfortable from the threshold of pain, those with French lineage require 513 grams (18 ounces) pressure, the Dutch, 488 grams (16 ounces), and English, 487 grams (17 ounces) pressure. Members with other lineage require much less pressure.

BRAIN WEIGHT AND STATURE

From Table 4, section D, it will be seen that the correlation coefficient for estimated brain weight and stature of all the 89 Members of Congress measured is 0.55±0.53, which is quite high when compared with the correlation of English brain weight with stature which, as given by Blakeman, is 0.288±0.057.

RADIO AGREEMENT BETWEEN CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I do not want to delay the debate on this particular measure more than a few moments. I waited yesterday in the hope that I would have an opportunity to say something about the Canadian-American agreement concerning radio channels, and I could not get the opportunity. To-morrow we are to take up the revenue bill, and for that reason I venture to break into the debate for a few moments to discuss that agreement.

On the 9th of May the Secretary of State gave to the press a statement containing the correspondence between the representatives of the Canadian Government and the representatives of this Government whereby it is agreed that Canada shall use for radio broadcasting certain wave lengths that she has not previously used, and that she shall have the privilege of sharing certain channels under this agreement. I ask unanimous consent that this statement may be printed in my remarks at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CAREY in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

RADIO BROADCASTING IN CANADA

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
May 9, 1932.

On May 5, 1932, the Canadian minister sent the following note to the Acting Secretary of State:

[No. 81]

CANADIAN LEGATION,
Washington, May 5, 1932.

The Hon. W. R. CASTLE, Jr.,
Acting Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that the Canadian House of Commons recently appointed a committee to inquire into the whole position of radiobroadcasting in Canada. This committee has under consideration a technical scheme for broadcasting in Canada which it is considered will provide satisfactory coverage in the chief population areas throughout the Dominion and at the same time make provision for the community service that may be desired. This scheme is divided into two distinct parts:

(a) A chain of high-power stations, operating on clear channels, and located at suitable intervals across Canada.

(b) A number of low-power stations of very limited range, operating on shared channels, and located as required for community service.

If this scheme receives the approval of Parliament, it is proposed to use 50-kilowatt stations, one in each of the Provinces of British Columbia, Manitoba, Ontario, Quebec, and eventually one in the maritime Provinces. In Saskatchewan and Alberta it is proposed to use 5-kilowatt stations at present, two being used in each Province, synchronized on a common channel. In Ontario there will be, in addition, two 10-kilowatt stations, one in western Ontario and one in northern Ontario. Four smaller stations of 1-kilowatt capacity each are provided for the Port Arthur-Fort William area, and for Ottawa, Montreal, and Quebec. In the maritimes, three 500-watt stations are provided for the present, one in each Province. The scheme also includes a 500-watt station on the shared channels for the city of Toronto for local service.

In adopting this plan Canada would reserve the right to increase the power of the stations in Alberta, Saskatchewan, northern and western Ontario to 50 kilowatts each, should such increase become necessary.

The committee, in addition to considering the power required, propose the following channels as suitable for the main stations:

Prince Edward Island, 630 kilocycles.
New Brunswick, 1,030 kilocycles.
Nova Scotia, 1,050 kilocycles.
Quebec, 930 kilocycles.

Montreal area (1 kilowatt), 600 kilocycles.
Montreal area (50 kilowatts), 730 kilocycles.
Ottawa, 880 kilocycles.
Toronto area (500 watts), 1,120 kilocycles.
Toronto area (50 kilowatts), 690 kilocycles.
Western Ontario, 840 kilocycles.
Northern Ontario, 960 kilocycles.
Port Arthur-Fort William area, 780 kilocycles.
Manitoba, 910 kilocycles.
Saskatchewan, 540 kilocycles.
Alberta, 1,030 kilocycles.
British Columbia, 1,100 kilocycles.

In order to insure satisfactory local broadcast service throughout Canada, it is proposed that stations, limited to a maximum power of 100 watts, be erected where necessary, and that they should be operated on shared channels. It is considered that 100 or more such stations may eventually be required in Canada, and that 20 channels should be available for this type of service. In establishing such stations it is proposed to maintain the same geographical separation between Canadian and United States stations as is maintained between United States stations of the same power.

Due notification would, of course, be given of the effective dates of any changes in the present operation to conform with the above plan.

In the event of the adoption of the above arrangement it is understood that if, as the result of the Madrid conference, any additional channels are made available for broadcasting a further allocation will be made as between the United States and Canada on an equitable basis.

I shall be obliged if you will inform me at your early convenience whether the United States authorities can make the necessary readjustments, so that these channels will be available for effective use in Canada.

I have the honor to be with the highest consideration, sir,

Your most obedient humble servant,

W. D. HERRIDGE.

The Acting Secretary of State sent the following note in reply:

MAY 5, 1932.

The Hon. WILLIAM DUNCAN HERRIDGE, K. C., D. S. O., M. C.,
Minister of the Dominion of Canada.

SIR: I am grateful for your courtesy in informing me by your note of May 5, 1932, of the technical plan which is being considered by the committee of the Canadian House of Commons as a means of providing Canada with satisfactory radiobroadcasting coverage. You inquire whether the authorities of the United States can make the readjustment necessary to render certain channels available for effective use in Canada.

In reply, I am glad to inform you that as notice is given from time to time of the dates of changes to be made in the present operations of Canadian broadcasting stations to conform to the plan set out, this Government will be glad to make the necessary readjustments.

It is understood that if, as the result of the Madrid conference, any additional channels are made available for broadcasting, a further allocation will be made, as between the United States and Canada, on an equitable basis.

Accept, sir, the renewed assurances of my highest consideration.

W. R. CASTLE,
Acting Secretary of State.

The committee of the Canadian House of Commons was appointed pursuant to the following resolution:

HOUSE OF COMMONS,
Wednesday, March 2, 1932.

Resolved, That a special committee of this House be appointed to consist of Messrs. Morand, Wright, Beynon, Smith (Cumberland), Gagnon, Cardin, Euler, Ilsley, and Garland (Bow River) for the following purposes:

1. To consider the report of the Royal Commission on Radio Broadcasting dated the 11th day of September, 1929, and commonly known as the Aird report.

2. To advise and recommend a complete technical scheme for radio broadcasting for Canada, so designed as to insure from Canadian sources as complete and satisfactory a service as the present development of radio science will permit.

3. To investigate and report upon the most satisfactory agency for carrying out such a scheme, with power to the said committee to send for persons and papers and to examine witnesses, and to report from time to time to this House.

Attest:

ARTHUR BEAUCHESNE,
Clerk of the House.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, under this agreement Canada will have 9 cleared channels instead of 6 cleared channels for the purpose of broadcasting. Then she will share the use of 6 channels instead of 11, as she previously did. Her system is to be run by the Government with nine large stations, one in each Province, connected for purposes of chain broadcasting; and she is then to be permitted to use whatever number of 100-watt stations she may later desire, and arrangements will be made between the Governments as to the use of wave lengths for that purpose.

I desire to call attention to what this agreement really does.

Under this agreement the Radio Commission approves the simultaneous operation of high-powered radio stations on the east coast and the west coast of this continent on the same wave length. It proposes to permit a high-powered station in Vancouver, British Columbia, to operate on the same wave length as station WPG in Atlantic City, N. J. It proposes to permit a station in Nova Scotia to operate on the same wave length as station KNX, a cleared-channel station in Los Angeles.

I do not complain of this arrangement, but I speak of it because the Radio Commission now has broken down the rule which it foolishly set up some years ago. It permits foreign stations to do what it has refused again and again to allow American stations to do, namely, to have simultaneous operation of stations on the two sides of the continent on the same wave length.

I have argued for a number of years that it was an indefensible waste of radio facilities to prohibit the use of a wave length by a radio station on the Pacific coast simply because some radio station on the Atlantic coast was using that wave length.

The decision of the district court of appeals in the WGY case some years ago laid down the principle that it was in the interest of the public listening to radio programs to permit WGY in Schnectady and KGO in Oakland to operate simultaneously with high power, because, as was pointed out, the service to the people within a few hundred miles of these stations was far more important than the possibility that a few listeners midway across the country might have the service of one station or another if both did not operate. But the thing that is a pitiful commentary upon it all is that our Radio Commission, appointed to administer radio in the interest of the American people, should consent that a foreign government should have stations which would operate on the two coasts instead of permitting our own stations here in this country to operate in that way.

I do not know what defense the Radio Commission can have now for refusing to allow a station in San Francisco, Portland, Tacoma, or Seattle from operating on the same wave length with a station in New York or Boston when it has agreed to permit a station in Vancouver, British Columbia, to operate on the same wave length with a station in Atlantic City.

I am glad the commission has reached the common-sense viewpoint of permitting this use of the radio facilities by the Canadian people; but I am, to say the least, humiliated that a commission appointed to serve the American people should refuse our own stations a privilege so long and now grant it to foreigners.

I hope the commission will have enough patriotism, will have enough consideration for the listening public of the two coasts of this country, that it will not further insist upon the technically indefensible and foolish rule of prohibiting stations which want to serve the people of the Pacific coast from operating simply because a station on the Atlantic coast is operating on the same wave length, or vice versa.

ST. CLAIR RIVER BRIDGE, MICHIGAN

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I report back favorably without amendment, from the Committee on Commerce, Senate bill 4581, to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the St. Clair River at or near Port Huron, Mich., and I submit a report thereon (No. 676).

This bill is in the usual form approved by the department. There seems to be anxiety for immediate action on the bill so that construction may start. I am sure there will be no controversy about the measure, and I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the times for commencing and completing the construction of the bridge across the St. Clair River at or near Port Huron, Mich., authorized to be built by the Great Lakes Bridge Commission by the act of Congress approved June 25, 1930, heretofore extended by an act of Congress approved February 28, 1931, are hereby further extended one and three years, respectively, from June 25, 1932.

SEC. 2. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

INCREASE OF BANKING FACILITIES

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 4412) to provide for the safer and more effective use of the assets of Federal reserve banks and of national banking associations to regulate interbank control, to prevent the undue diversion of funds into speculative operations, and for other purposes.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, the pending amendment is the amendment which I offered on yesterday. I ask leave to perfect the amendment by substituting for it the amendment which I send to the desk.

Mr. VANDENBERG's amendment as modified is as follows:

On page 45, line 8, after the period, insert: "Except in a city, town, or village where there is no national or State bank regularly transacting customary banking business, no such association shall establish a branch except by taking over an existing unit bank or an affiliate of such association."

Mr. KEAN obtained the floor.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CAREY in the chair). The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Austin	Cutting	Johnson	Patterson
Bailey	Dale	Kean	Reed
Bankhead	Davis	Kendrick	Robinson, Ind.
Barbour	Dill	Keyes	Sheppard
Barkley	Fletcher	King	Smoot

Capper	Goldsborough	Metcalf	Walsh, Mass.
Carey	Gore	Moses	Walsh, Mont.
Cohen	Hale	Norbeck	Wheeler
Connally	Hastings	Norris
Coolidge	Hayden	Nye
Copeland	Hull	Oddie

Mr. McNARY. I wish to announce that the following Senators are absent, engaged in the Committee on Appropriations: The Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON], and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-seven Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, I desire to say at the start that I am making no reflection upon any of the Members of the Senate on the other side of the aisle, whose patriotism I believe equals my own, and whose love of country I believe is as great as it is on this side of the aisle. But it seems to me it is my duty to draw the attention of the Senate to some of the things which have happened in the Banking and Currency Committee, of which I have not the honor to be a member, and which have come under my observation.

The Banking and Currency Committee, under a resolution passed by the Senate, appointed a subcommittee to examine into the operations in New York in regards to pools and other transactions involving directly or indirectly the depression of the securities listed on the stock exchange. They have examined witnesses from Wall Street, and have had testimony, not from members of the stock exchange but from others, showing that they have been engaged in violent speculation both on the bull side and the bear side of the market.

The Bible tells us that one should pull out the beam that is in his own eye before considering the mote that is in his neighbor's eye.

When Mr. Eugene Meyer was requested to testify before the Banking and Currency Committee I went to that committee to hear his testimony. There was another person in the witness seat when I arrived there. On the right hand of the stenographer sat the distinguished Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] and on the left the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY]. Immediately behind them was a man I did not know, but I soon found out his name was Mr. H. Parker Willis. Mr. Willis kept suggesting questions to Mr. GLASS, and perhaps to Mr. BULKLEY also, and it seemed to me that it was Mr. Willis who was cross-examining the witness, rather than either of the distinguished gentlemen I have mentioned.

I believe Mr. Willis was employed by the Banking and Currency Committee, and in this confidential position was enabled to obtain facts and figures from the Federal reserve banks and from the Comptroller of the Currency in the name of the committee, to which no Senator on the floor of the Senate and no Senator except the members of the subcommittee in charge of the so-called Glass bill had access. In this confidential capacity Mr. Willis received that information, and was in almost daily communication with Paris, transmitting the information to the Paris newspapers.

The first copy of a dispatch that I have is dated October 11, 1931, in which Mr. Willis talks of the coming of the French representatives to talk over the financial plan with the President and the Secretary of the Treasury. He informs the readers of the French papers that—

The total of foreign short-term securities of all sorts which could be rapidly withdrawn from the United States is estimated at a little more than $700,000,000.

The dangers to the gold standard are well understood and the banks are taking all the measures necessary to assure it a maximum of protection.

For Saturday the exploitations of gold were $2,000,000, and the amount reserved (earmarked) was increased by $18,800,000.

I send to the desk Mr. H. Parker Willis's telegram, taken from the French paper, together with a translation thereof, and ask to have the translation printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The translation is as follows:

THE HOOVER PLAN AND THE GREAT AMERICAN BANKS—THE MISTAKES OF THE DIRECTORS OF THE FEDERAL RESERVE SYSTEM—THE PROBLEM OF DOLLARS AND GOLD RESERVES—CRITICISM OF THE POLICY FOLLOWED FOR TWO YEARS BY THE HOOVER ADMINISTRATION—PARLIAMENTARY CIRCLES SHOW THEMSELVES QUITE SKEPTICAL AS TO THE PRACTICAL RESULTS OF THE VIEW OF MR. LAVAL—THE SINO-JAPANESE CONFLICT

NEW YORK, October 11.—In spite of the irregular movements of the last two weeks, the atmosphere in Wall Street is better; the general statement is more optimistic and the market price is being well maintained in most divisions.

The Hoover plan of reanimating banking affairs seems to have been well received, and the subscriptions of banks from all parts of the country to the National Credit Corporation appear important. The measure of its real success depends upon the stopping of the withdrawal of funds and the restoration of confidence; one can not render in this respect for some time. No doubt there will be still a certain number of banking failures, although the plan should bring about a diminution of them The essential thing is to know whether the great banks will have sufficient breadth of view to recognize the necessity of putting an end to the bank failures, medium and small, or whether they will persist in the egotism which they have shown for years, being content to declare that the establishments failing were too insignificant for their difficulties to be given serious consideration.

Public opinion is much aroused against the negligence of the directors of the Federal reserve system and the bad methods of the principal banks which have led to the present crisis. Consequently it may not be completely reassured if the least capable directors of the Federal reserve system and certain members of the banking organizations of various cities do not leave their posts. That is an element of uncertainty which must be taken into account.

In enlightened circles, opposition is still increasing against the project to amend the statutes of the Federal reserve system to permit the discount of paper guaranteed by industrial or railroad bonds; but most of the officials continue to think that the adoption of this amendment will present no difficulties. The truth is quite otherwise, an important part of Congress being hostile to every plan for the enlargement of the bases of discount. If the plan envisaged is adopted, which is not at all certain, it will be done only by a violent struggle, because of the lack of prestige of the administration, and the general feeling of the country that for two years there has been a total absence of comprehension and competence to meet the danger of panic and atrophy.

The coming of Mr. Laval to New York is more and more commented upon in the world of affairs, whose feeling toward France—treated up to you as a European country of no great financial interest for America—is completely modified. The opinion continues to prevail on the American side that the interview will be as extensive as Mr. Laval permits. It is believed that the question of a new moratorium of the war debts and a moratorium of reparations for several years will be put forward.

On all sides a discussion on the subject of the gold standard is demanded also, and a clear exposition of the attitude of France on the entire gold question, which will give more clarity to the Washington policy. Many people are disturbed by the danger that the gold standard might fall because of the Hoover-Mellon plan to give more latitude to the discount operations of the reserve banks. One is surprised that the elements of the problem are so well known and that the dangers are so clearly appreciated on the foreign exchanges; it appears, in consequence, the more imperative not to do anything which might strengthen the apprehensions and harm still more the situation of the dollar.

Banking operations have been extended during the past week; the available funds of gold of the reserve banks have put financial establishments in a better position in regard to the foreign agreements. The total of foreign short-term securities of all sorts which could be rapidly withdrawn from the United States is estimated at a little more than $700,000,000. The available funds of gold would reach $900,000,000.

The dangers to the gold standard are well understood and the banks are taking all the measures necessary to assure it a maximum of protection. For Saturday the exportations of gold were $2,000,000 and the amount reserved (earmarked) was increased by $18,800,000.

In parliamentary circles one is skeptical as to the practical results of Mr. Laval's visit, but one is ready to welcome any new elucidation which may result. Everything depends on the attitude of the administration and the measure in which the public is informed with precision so that it understands the situation.

The Sino-Japanese conflict has aroused only slight interest in business and financial circles, whose attention is absorbed by the immediate complication of affairs in the United States. Washington is studying the question. So far the conflict has not appreciably affected the stock exchange or the commercial markets.

H. PARKER WILLIS.

Mr. KEAN. On October 14, 1931, Mr. Willis cabled on the arrival of the Frenchmen in this country that they were charged, if necessary, to withdraw a large part of the remaining "short-term funds belonging to the Bank of France, and thus possibly avoid an erroneous interpretation of the conferences with Mr. Laval in case that, after his visit, these withdrawals are decided upon." "The indications which I cable you have not an official character, but come from a competent source."

I ask whether the Bank of France did not make threats to withdraw these funds in hopes of forcing the United States to further extend the moratorium, and I also ask, Mr. President, what is the "competent source" that allowed Mr. H. Parker Willis to cable on the 14th day of October, 1931, such a statement as this?

On October 17, 1931, Mr. Willis cabled:

I learn from a good source that the French envoys have arrived at an agreement with the authorities of the Federal reserve system. The Bank of France will leave here available deposits valued between two hundred and three hundred million dollars; two hundred millions will be freed on earmark gold. The Federal reserve bank, to remain in line with this agreement, must be induced to raise the discount rate to 4 per cent and even higher and ask to practice a better selection of commercial paper to protect the gold coin and bullion, avoiding all securities not bankable or difficult to negotiate. An investigation has shown that the amount of foreign credits still open here is $1,200,000,000 and that of American credits abroad is $600,000,000.

Where did Mr. H. Parker Willis obtain this information?

On October 21, 1931:

The Bank of France is said to have purchased to-day on the market a new amount of about twenty millions in securities. It has made known to the great financial establishments its desire to see increased by one-half per cent the interest on the funds which it has in deposit in our market.

On October 22, 1931:

Statesmen have told me that several criticisms will be made in Congress on the subject of the policy of the Federal reserve system, especially in regard to the granting of credits to Germany and England last summer.

Among the numerous subjects which Laval and Hoover must discuss, two problems seem to have the greatest chance of a useful solution in the form of an "entente cordiale," the circulation of gold and questions of a monetary and banking nature.

At midnight on October 23, 1931, Mr. Willis cabled:

I learned from an authoritative source that the policy of the deposit of the Bank of France and of the gold held in the United States decreed by the French representative has been submitted to the French Government and accepted as satisfactory.

Another person of great authority told me that the Government is much embarrassed by the attitude of a certain public, which expects too much from the Laval-Hoover conversations.

I understand that difficulties might arise from the fact that the French representatives may have committed the same tactical error as Mr. Montague Norman did some years ago. The negotiations of the government of the Bank of England failed because in omitting to consult the Federal Reserve Board they failed to recognize the rights of that supreme authority of the Federal reserve system. The directors of certain Federal reserve banks have been accustomed in recent years to have little regard for the board and have pretended that they themselves represent the Federal reserve system in Europe, although they had no right to do so. Under these conditions it may be that certain questions which appear solved by the visit of Mr. Laval will still remain open after his departure.

I call attention to this part of the telegram because Senators will notice that in the so-called Glass bill the authority to negotiate is taken away from the board of the Federal reserve bank and vested entirely in the board created by this bill.

On October 27, 1931, a cable was sent, but it contains no special information that could not be obtained from ordinary sources.

On November 3, 1931, a cable was sent, but this also contains nothing except information that is readily obtainable by any person.

On December 2, 1931, Mr. Willis cabled "the pessimism of numerous operators knows no limit." In his dispatch of December 7, 1931, he said:

The present vogue of issuing Treasury bonds at a very low rate of interest constitutes an anomaly which can only be upheld by the tacit authorization to use the bonds to obtain credit from the reserve banks. In case the Treasury should be obliged to follow the recommendation of the bankers the present market prices of Liberty bonds can not be maintained.

In other words, he is warning the French that they had better sell United States bonds. These dispatches cost the United States from December 3 to December 5, 1931, $1,722,000 in gold shipped abroad.

On December 14, 1931, the dispatch deals with the forming of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation—to authorize the credit corporation to discount at the reserve banks, on the same basis as the funds of the Government, various classes of securities up to a sum of $2,000,000,000.

On December 15, 1931, Mr. Willis cabled with regard to the plan for a new credit corporation, "It is said the plan would tend toward inflation." During the week ending December 12, 1931, $3,513,000 in gold was shipped out of the United States.

That is the first mention in his dispatches of inflation. I do not know whether the Senate realizes what inflation means in Europe. Germany inflated until their currency became worthless. France inflated until their currency was worth less than 80 per cent of what it was prior to the war. Thus it can be seen that the word "inflation" would frighten any investor, any holder of American securities, any banker who held American currency. All such people would be very much alarmed by the word "inflation."

On December 17, 1931, a cable was sent to France, from which I quote:

The serious situation of various kinds of financial establishments, which have large portfolios of securities, whose market price is constantly dropping without any really justified motive, comes in large part from the realizations effected by other bearers who procure funds for themselves, in a period when the demands of the market are more unusual than they have ever been.

From December 14 to December 18, 1931, we shipped $5,148,000 in gold.

From December 21 to December 26, 1931, we shipped $8,295,000 in gold from the United States.

From December 28 to December 31, 1931, we shipped $13,954,000 in gold.

January 6, 1932: The heading of the dispatch is, "The various inflation tendencies." Inflationist ideas are coming to light to such an extent that a number of absurd projects for the issuing of new notes as legal tender are being proposed. The Government operations themselves bear the danger of inflation.

I have never mentioned any provision which would tend to inflate the public debt, nevertheless, the intention exists.

Loans on a vast scale are also inevitable, the budgetary deficit being more than two billions.

We shipped during this week $6,679,000 in gold.

Let us consider for a moment, Mr. President, what inflation means to Europe. Germany inflated her currency after the war until it went from 24 cents to nothing, and everybody who held German marks lost what had been paid for them. France inflated after the war, thereby reducing the value of the franc 80 per cent, and everybody who held francs lost 80 per cent of their value. This shows what the talk of inflation means to Europe.

On January 13, 1932, the dispatch was headed "The inflationist policy." The dispatch reads:

Inflation is the order of the day.

Again—

All attempts to restrain inflation and prevent expansion of credit which would have as a basis long-term engagements will meet general opposition.

On January 17, 1932, the cable reads:

The fact that the Federal reserve system is participating in a program of inflation is considered by certain authorities as a violation of the entente which was made public at the time of the visit of Laval and even before.

During this week we shipped $17,138,000 in gold.

On January 20, 1932, a cable to France was headed "The antideflationist measures and their consequences."

The problem of inflation continues to be keenly debated in financial and political circles.

During this week we shipped $41,214,000 in gold.

On January 24, 1932, a cable was sent, from which I quote:

The definite adoption of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is received with less enthusiasm than was predicted. It is probable that the market is going to remain in expectation, awaiting a definite term taken by the question of inflation and by those of the banking policy and the railroad régime. Wall Street seems to be at the point where its capacity for resistance may be again put to the test.

During this week we shipped $42,154,000 in gold.

During the week ending February 6, 1932, we shipped $34,489,000 in gold.

The last dispatch which I have is dated February 14, 1932. During the week ending February 13, 1932, we shipped $36,129,000 in gold.

From February 16 to February 20, 1932, we shipped $52,371,000 in gold.

From February 24 to February 27, 1932, we shipped $5,047,000 in gold.

During the week ending March 5, 1932, we shipped $28,920,000 in gold.

For the week ending March 12, 1932, we shipped $2,756,000 in gold.

On March 15, 1932, we shipped $12,511,000 in gold.

On April 8, 1932, and April 9, 1932, we shipped $10,919,000 in gold.

During the week ending April 16, 1932, we shipped $12,286,000 in gold.

During the week ending April 23, 1932, we shipped $22,626,000 in gold.

Nothing affects the credit of the country as does the shipment of gold. This contracts the credit basis of the country to the extent of $10 for every dollar of gold shipped abroad.

To recapitulate, the following gold shipments were made:

December, 1931	$32,632,000
January, 1932	107,185,000
February, 1932	128,036,000
March, 1932	$44,187,000
April, 1932	45,831,000
Total	357,871,000

On the basis of a contraction of $10 in credit for every dollar of gold shipped, the following contraction is shown:

December, 1931	$326,320,000
January, 1932	1,071,850,000
February, 1932	1,280,360,000
March, 1932	441,870,000
April, 1932	458,310,000
Total	3,578,710,000

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. KEAN. I yield.

Mr. KING. I am not sure that I understand the implications the Senator desires to be drawn from his remarks. I rise, however, to inquire if it is not a fact that the world at large has suffered because of the maldistribution of gold, the United States and France having approximately 70 per cent of the $11,000,000,000 of gold in the world? It is also known that European nations, France among them, had in the United States considerable gold, which was earmarked, and they also had credits calling for gold. Does the Senator think that we could have inhibited France and other nations that had gold which was earmarked and which was in the United States and that also had credits which they had obtained in the United States from shipping gold from the United States to themselves, they being entitled to it?

Mr. KEAN. Gold is shipped, Mr. President, according to the rate of exchange. Of course, a foreign nation that owns gold in the United States could have it shipped to itself, anyway. Foreign nations can come here and buy gold; but, as a rule, when gold is shipped in quantities, it is because of goods, securities, or some other commodity being sent to this country, which creates a credit in favor of the country sending them here, against which they may draw exchange. If the price of exchange goes sufficiently higher than par to cover the cost of shipment, insurance, freight, and to insure a profit, then gold is shipped. Does that answer the Senator's question?

Mr. KING. I am not sure that I quite understand the Senator's answer; but it does seem to me, Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, there having been a considerable flight of gold from Europe to the United States, much of which was earmarked, and some of which consisted of credits which France or other nations or individuals or corporations had in the United States, they, having the gold here, had a right to withdraw it. While we might have desired to have it retained here, I am not so sure that it was not advantageous, generally speaking, to the world's commerce and the trade to have a little better distribution of gold than has existed for the past year or two.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, when gold is earmarked, it means that it is put in vaults; it is gold that France or some other country has bought here, but does not choose to ship at the present time. Therefore, it is simply in storage and is not affected by the exchange rate; it belongs to the country that bought it; and although the exchange rate may go to the gold shipping point, instead of shipping it and paying the price of shipping it, they simply say, "Store that gold for us."

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me, I think it is true that a considerable amount of gold was purchased in the United States and a great deal came here as the result of settling the balances of trade. Nevertheless, I think that, because of the precarious situation of some of the countries of Europe during the past two years, there was a large amount of gold shipped to the United States because they believed that in the United States it was safer than it was in their own country. I may be in error, but that is my recollection of the facts.

Mr. KEAN. I have no doubt that is true, for as long as we are on the gold basis many countries of the world will open accounts in New York and Chicago and various other cities where they will keep large balances, because they feel that they can get that money back at any time they want it. That is the reason they send it here; but, of course, if they buy the gold, then the gold belongs to them, and they have it in storage. In exchange transactions, however, as a rule the exchange of a country must go up to a point above par before it is profitable to ship gold. Gold is worth so much per ounce. In the United States, I think, gold is 99 fine; the sovereign is about 98 fine; and so gold must go up to a point where an ounce of it in England will pay the freight and insurance, and so forth, in order that the shipment may be profitable.

Mr. President, as I have shown, the withdrawal of these vast quantities of gold means the contraction of credit in the United States to the extent of $3,578,710,000; and that is one of the difficulties of the situation.

The result of the dispatches to which I have referred has been to make depositors of foreign money in the United States withdraw their funds and to frighten foreign investors to such an extent that they have sold back securities which they had bought in the United States. Large amounts of dollars have been for many years circulated throughout Europe, both in the form of gold notes and Federal reserve notes. Europe has been so frightened that at times one could buy $1 in American money at 2 or 3 cents less than its face value.

To illustrate this propaganda, an Amsterdam correspondent wrote that while, of course, he knew that the firm of Curtis & Sanger, having a branch in Red Bank, N. J., had failed, yet the principal paper in Amsterdam published the following:

An important bank failure in the United States. The Red Bank has failed. Labor organizations are very powerful in America

The question is, Mr. President, whether the original Glass bill was not conceived and largely written by Mr. H. Parker Willis. In my opinion it was not written or conceived for the best interests of the United States.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I can answer the Senator very peremptorily on that proposition. There is not a sentence in the bill that the technician of the committee was not directed to put in it by the subcommittee. It was not conceived by him, but was conceived by the various members of the subcommittee, and passed on exhaustively by the Banking and Currency Committee with a pretty full membership.

Mr. KEAN. I am very glad to hear that, because it looked to me very much as if Mr. H. Parker Willis had very largely drawn the bill.

The present Glass bill has many of the features of the original Glass bill.

After the panic of 1907 there was passed what was known as the Vreeland-Aldrich Act, approved May 30, 1908, establishing the National Monetary Commission. The distinguished Senator from Rhode Island did a tremendous work on this commission. He investigated the banking systems of the entire world, the reports of which include over 30 volumes. There was submitted to the Senate a bill to incorporate a national reserve association of the United States. This bill was introduced in the Sixty-second Congress and was not considered. It was, however, reintroduced in the first session of the Sixty-third Congress and known as Senate bill No. 7. It has been commonly referred to as the Aldrich bill.

This bill created a central bank with 15 branches. It was made a matter of general debate throughout the United States, and was discussed in all the large cities of the Nation. It was condemned by the Democratic National Convention at Baltimore on July 3, 1912, which was the convention that nominated Mr. Wilson for the Presidency, in the following words:

We oppose the so-called Aldrich bill for the establishment of a central bank; and we believe the people of the country will be largely freed from panics and consequent unemployment and business depression by such a systematic revision of our banking laws as will render temporary relief in localities where such relief is needed, with protection from control or dominion by what is known as the Money Trust.

Banks exist for the accommodation of the public and not for the control of business. All legislation on the subject of banking and currency should have for its purpose the securing of these accommodations on terms of absolute security to the public and of complete protection from the misuse of the power that wealth gives to those who possess it.

We condemn the present methods of depositing Government funds in a few favored banks, largely situated in or controlled by Wall Street, in return for political favors, and we pledge our party to provide by law for their deposit by competitive bidding in the banking institutions of the country, National and State, without discrimination as to locality, upon approved securities and subject to call by the Government.

The present Federal reserve system is composed of eight banks, each bank having its own directors, the majority of whom are elected by the member banks. In other words, the original Federal reserve act contemplated not a central bank but 12 regional banks. The present Glass bill repudiates the original Federal reserve bank, goes back to the Aldrich bill condemned by the Democratic Party, and concentrates all the power in the Federal Reserve Board in Washington. Seven members are political appointees, and only two of them are required to have tested banking experience. Commercial banks have no representation on this board, but they have on the reserve banks. The question raised by the bill, therefore, is one of reversal of the national policy underlying the creation of the Federal reserve system. It would seem that a change in national policy ought not to be made during the critical financial period through which the world is now passing, but this change should await a more settled time and a thorough study and broad public discussion of the advisability of the proposed change.

While many of the deflationary characteristics of the original bill have been eliminated in the last draft, there are certain features which would be particularly disturbing to the financial structure of the country at this time.

In effect the security affiliates of national banks are to be eliminated within three years. This means that national banks would have to commence to liquidate the portfolios of their security affiliates upon a declining market. The destruction of national bank security affiliates would also mean the loss of a large portion of the security-distributing machinery of the country. In view of the large refunding operations of municipalities, railroads, and industry, which will require every existing means to meet, a change in the machinery of distribution would prevent the early emergence of the country from the existing depression.

The contribution of member banks to the liquidating corporation means the freezing up of member-bank assets to the extent of these subscriptions.

I should like to say that that means locking up at the present time practically thirteen times the amount of money involved. At the present time, if you deposit $100 in a bank, you lock up $13. If this bill becomes a law as it is, as I figure it, it would lock 16.30 per cent of every dollar that is deposited in every bank in the country.

Section 13 prohibits any national bank from owning more than 10 per cent of "the total amount of any issue of investment securities of any one obligor or maker." It is a common practice in forced reorganizations of industrial companies for banks to accept an issue of securities in exchange for the commercial debt of the industry; and many banks have in their portfolios the entire amount of a particular issue of the industry, although the total amount held does not exceed the 10 per cent limitation of capital and surplus of the bank. If national banks are required to sell their excess holdings of issues of securities of this character, it would mean throwing on the market securities which, from the very nature of their origin, have little or no ready public market, with consequent great loss to the bank.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. KEAN. I do.

Mr. FESS. The Senator is dealing now with an item about which there has been a great deal of opposition from certain sections of my own State.

Mr. KEAN. Naturally there would be, because if a bank has $1,000,000 of capital and surplus and makes a loan of $100,000 to an industrial company, and the industrial company fails, perhaps the bank may take the whole $100,000, or perhaps the bank is a little bigger and may take $150,000 and get somebody else to put in some money behind it and start the industry over again. Under this bill the bank could not hold more than 10 per cent of the total issues of any one obligor. It could hold up to $100,000, but it could not hold above $100,000. If it held $150,000 of debt, it would have to sell it to somebody else; and it could not sell it when the company had failed.

Mr. FESS. The Senator will recognize that Ohio has four cities of considerably over 300,000 population each and five others of over 100,000.

Mr. KEAN. Yes.

Mr. FESS. It is quite a banking State; and from many of those cities I have had opposition specifically to this feature. Is there any effort to correct it in the bill?

Mr. KEAN. I have an amendment which corrects it. It is submitted that the true test of the amount of a bank's investment is the same as the test for the amount of a bank's loan; that is, the relation of the investment or the loan to the bank's capital and surplus and not whether or not the investment or loan represents more than 10 per cent of the debtor's obligation of a particular issue.

The limitation of a bank's loan to one debtor to 10 per cent of the bank's capital and surplus is further limited by including loans to any subsidiary of the debtor. This provision may be sound in principle, but there must be many large railroad, utility, and industrial groups which would be affected by this amendment and which can not now establish new lines of credit. Unless time for compliance with the limitation is given, many large companies may be made unable to meet their obligations.

The bill proposes the abolition of all affiliates where the connection between the bank and the affiliate is represented by stock certificates, and permits in a different technical situation the continuance of some affiliates. For example, a holding company controlling a bank may also control a trust-company affiliate, but not a security affiliate. Also, some State banks and trust companies have charter authority to own shares of stock; and any affiliate of these banks and trust companies may be, and frequently is, a wholly owned subsidiary of the State bank or trust company. The ownership of these affiliates is not affected by the bill.

I should like to say in this connection, Mr. President, that there is a strong feeling among the State banks and trust companies all over the United States owning more than $200,000,000 of stocks that if this bill passes they will either have to get out of the Federal reserve system or else take a perfectly enormous loss on the stocks they now hold.

National banks, having no authority to own shares of stock, have been obliged to link their trust-company affiliates and security affiliates through the identity of stock ownership of the affiliate with the shareholders of the national bank. The practical effect, therefore, of the provision that a national bank stock certificate shall not be tied up with the certificate of stock of any other corporation is to eliminate trust-company and security-company affiliates if the bank continues to remain in the national system.

I would like to say there, Mr. President, that there are a great many banks all over the United States which have built large banking houses, and in order to finance them they have created affiliates, to which their stockholders have subscribed. They have put mortgages on the banking houses and the stock of the bank and the stock of the affiliates is identical. So that if this bill becomes a law and these affiliates are separated, then they would have to separate the stock, and there would be one man owning a few shares representing the building, another man owning a few shares representing the bank, and under those circumstances the man owning the shares representing the building would say that the bank was not paying him enough rent, and the man owning the shares of the bank would say that the bank was paying too much rent. There would be a continual squabble, whereas under the law as it stands now, where the stockholder is the same in both cases, trouble of that kind is avoided.

State banks and trust companies which now have a security affiliate as a wholly owned subsidiary are not affected by the bill. It is true there is a provision in section 5 affecting banks admitted to membership after the passage of the bill which would, if the bill is in that respect constitutional, deprive such banks of the right to own stock in a subsidiary. This, however, does not seem to be applicable to State banks and trust companies now members of the system.

Trust companies were originally affiliated with national banks when national banks did not have the authority to exercise trust powers. During their existence these State trust companies have become trustees under many deeds of trust. It is exceedingly doubtful, under the existing law, whether one of these trust companies can be consolidated with a national bank without destroying the authority to act as trustee under existing trusts. National banks now have trust powers, and it could not have been the intention of the bill to change the existing policy of the law by eliminating this branch of a national bank's organization simply because a separate corporation had to be originally employed. One practical solution, if the bill becomes law in its present form, might be for the national bank to become a State bank and consolidate with the trust company under the trust company's charter, but this means a weakening of the national-bank system.

It is submitted that the elimination of any unsound practices of banks through security affiliates which Congress may wish to correct can be adequately reached by the provisions in the bill for examination and report of affiliates and by the power given the Federal Reserve Board to maintain sound credit conditions and to restrict the availability of 15-day loans to member banks.

The report from affiliates, which is to be published, requires a statement of "the expense of operation for the preceding year," but not a profit and loss account. It would seem the latter item was more informing to the public and more usual in any corporate report. The provision for publication of the affiliate's entire portfolio, if it is borrowing from any bank 5 per cent or 10 per cent of its parent bank's capital and surplus, appears to be important to the lending bank, not the public, and the common sense of this requirement can not be seen.

An opinion has been written on the Glass bill by Dr. Benjamin M. Anderson, jr., economist of the Chase National Bank, of New York, which I send to the desk and ask to be inserted in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[The Chase Economic Bulletin, Vol. XII, No. 1, issued April 25, 1932, on Proposed Banking Legislation, by Benjamin M. Anderson, jr., Ph. D., economist of the Chase National Bank, of the city of New York, discusses the Glass bill]

The revised Glass bill, S. 4412, voted by the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency on April 16, though a much softened document as compared with S. 4115, still retains the essentially wrong point of view of the original measure. It is aimed at symptoms rather than causes. Designed to prevent a repetition of the speculative orgy of 1928–29, and the abuse of bank credit and financial machinery which that speculative orgy involved, it actually contains no provisions which, had they been in effect in 1928–29 and in the preceding period when the unsound situation was created, would have prevented the main evils of that period.

The earlier Glass bill was designed to sweep away a great body of financial practices which have grown up by an evolutionary process in the country, and which have, on the whole, worked well. The new bill is less sweeping in its scope, but is unchanged in spirit. In the years 1928–29 these normal financial practices obviously and notoriously worked very badly, with results which have been disastrous for the country and for the world. Less obviously but demonstrably, they were being perverted and poisoned in the years which preceded, the process beginning, in fact, in early 1922 and moving rapidly from the middle of 1924 to the end of 1927.

The remedy is not to be found in striking at the financial practices and institutions which were thus perverted and poisoned. The remedy is rather to eliminate for the future the poison which perverted them. That poison is a general excess of bank credit at artificially low rates, growing out of excessive bank reserves, the control of which rests with the open-market policy and discount policy of the Federal reserve system. The original Glass bill contained some provisions aimed at preventing overrapid expansion of bank credit in the future. The present measure contains practically nothing that would work in this direction.

The new bill does contain, however, many important provisions which would make a great deal of unnecessary disturbance in the banking situation and less sound rather than sounder conditions in the securities market and in the general banking situation. Among these may be especially mentioned the provision designed to force branch banking on States which do not want it; those aimed at abolishing the security affiliates of chartered banks; those drastically limiting the ability of banks to engage in buying and selling bonds; the provision restricting bank loans to consolidated businesses; the provision dealing with brokers' loans "for account of others"; and the provision taxing solvent banks for the purpose of liquidating insolvent banks, which is apparently an opening wedge for the permanent adoption by the Federal Government of the policy, already proved unsound by various States, of bank deposit guaranty.

SENATOR GLASS'S DISAPPOINTMENT

The present writer entertains a great respect for Senator GLASS and shares his disappointment that so many of the purposes of the Federal reserve act have been defeated. Senator GLASS had supposed that he had created a commercial paper system, under which Federal reserve credit would expand and contract with the needs of trade, as manifested by the rediscount of commercial paper. The original act authorized the use of Government bonds as a basis for Federal reserve credit, but the total of Government bonds in existence was only about a billion dollars, of which seven hundred millions was used as security for national-bank notes. Much of the rest was in trust funds, leaving too small a floating supply to serve as a real basis for Federal reserve credit. The war and the great issue of Liberty bonds spoiled the original plan. Since early 1917 Federal reserve credit has been governed rather (a) by the fiscal needs of the Treasury, or (b) by the policy of the Federal reserve authorities.

THE BASIC CAUSE—CHEAP MONEY AND BANK EXPANSION

A physician, dealing with a diphtheria patient, does not employ a wide range of remedies for each of the symptoms. Instead he uses a serum to control the germ. For the past 11 years the Chase Economic Bulletin has been tracing the progress of the disease which culminated in the mad symptoms of 1929 and in the disasters which followed, and protesting against the original infection and the continued reinfections. From January, 1922, to April 11 of 1928 the loans and investments of the commercial banks of the United States (savings banks and private banks excluded) increased fourteen and one-half billion dollars, while their deposits increased thirteen and one-half billion dollars. This very great and wholly unnecessary expansion of bank credit may be compared with that which was necessary to finance and win the war. Between April of 1917 and December of 1918 we financed the four Liberty loans and a great volume of short-term Government paper. We transformed industry from a peace-time to a war-time basis. We did business on a very high and rising level of commodity prices. We sent an immense army to France and built a merchant marine. To accomplish this we expanded bank credit by $5,800,000,000 in deposits and seven billions in loans and investments. The expansion, more than twice as great, from the middle of 1922 to April of 1928, on the other hand, was added to a volume of credit already greater than commerce needed, and went into noncommercial uses, notably real-estate mortgage loans, installment finance, bank investments in bonds, including foreign bonds, and stock and bond collateral loans, including loans on foreign securities.

THE CAUSES OF THE EXPANSION

Three abnormal circumstances made this expansion: (1) Gold came to us from the outside world in great quantity. (2) The Federal reserve banks intensified the influence of this incoming gold by keeping their rediscount rates below the market and by engaging on a great scale in open-market purchases of Government securities and acceptances. These two things in combination made bank reserves excessive through practically all the period, and when bank reserves are excessive bank credit expands rapidly. (3) The low reserve requirements of member banks, reduced by the war-time amendments to the Federal reserve act, greatly intensified the influence of excessive reserves.

STAGES IN FEDERAL RESERVE POLICY

Heavy buying of Government securities in 1922 started a boom which created alarm and led to a reversal of Federal reserve policy in early 1923. In 1924 the Federal reserve authorities bought Government securities on a gigantic scale and reduced rediscount rates and acceptance rates to very low levels. Bank expansion grew by leaps and bounds. The stock market rose, and a great flood of new securities was issued, including approximately a billion dollars of foreign securities. In 1927 an immense new move in the direction of cheap money began.

THE DRAMATIC ABUSES AGAINST WHICH THE GLASS BILL IS AIMED FOLLOWED THE CHEAP MONEY EPISODE OF 1927

The worst of the evils at which the Glass bill is aimed followed this last episode. (1) The stock market started its wild and apparently uncontrollable rise. (2) The immense issue of investment trust securities followed, though there had been a substantial amount of this before. (3) There was a rapid multiplication of investment and financial institutions of all kinds—finance companies, houses for underwriting, wholesaling and retailing of securities, including security affiliates of banks, and branch offices of brokerage houses. (4) The rapid throwing together of banks through holding companies, with rapidly rising prices of bank stocks and holding company stocks followed. (5) The most reckless issue of unsound securities of various kinds followed. (6) The largest volume of foreign securities placed in any 12 months' period took place from the middle of 1927 to the middle of 1928, when the total exceeded $1,800,000,000 publicly placed, refunding excluded. (7) The great increase in brokers' loans followed, the total figure rising from a little over three billions in early 1927 to over eight billions in October of 1929. (8) Brokers' loans "for account of others" rose, according to the Federal reserve figures, from about $700,000,000 in early 1927 to a peak of $3,907,000,000 in October of 1929, while the total of these "outside loans," if we add to the Federal reserve figures the additional items reported by the stock exchange itself, increased from a little over a billion in early 1927 to over five billions in October, 1929. (9) Bank credit expanded with startling rapidity from July 27, 1927, to January 4, 1928, the increase for the commercial banks being $3,361,000,000 in loans and investments, and $3,117,000,000 in deposits.

All of these main symptoms can be related to one common cause—cheap money and excessive credit.

APPARENT ABUNDANCE OF INVESTORS' MONEY AND GREAT VOLUME OF "BROKERS' LOANS FOR ACCOUNT OF OTHERS" IN 1928–29 GREW OUT OF THE BANK EXPANSION WHICH HAD PRECEDED

(a) Old investments displaced: There was an apparent abundance of investors' money from the middle of 1924 till toward the end of the boom. But it was not new savings. Here is a concrete instance. A joint-stock land bank in Missouri floated a bond issue in New York. The syndicate which took the issue borrowed from New York banks to get the money while the bonds were being placed, receiving deposits with the New York banks—a process of bank expansion. The deposits were transferred to a large city in Missouri. Then part of the deposits were transferred to an interior town in Missouri, where an old 7 per cent farm mortgage that had stood for many years was refunded at a lower rate. The mortgagee, a lady, was paid off. She sent the funds to New York to buy some bonds. This was investors' money coming to New York from the interior, but it started in bank expansion in New York. The lady did not save that money. She inherited it. Her father saved that money 40 years before. All over the country, in this process of bank expansion, there was a similar shifting and switching about of old displaced investments.

(b) The new securities issued in excess of needs created huge cash assets for corporations, foreign banks, and others, which was the source of "brokers' loans for account of others." Never before in our history was any such volume of nonbanking money available for brokers' loans.

Expansion had gone so far and so fast before the stock market got wild, and before the money rates got high in 1928 and 1929, that when the Federal reserve system tried to put the brakes on gently it found itself pumping back again the funds it had previously put out, which helped to defeat its efforts to control the situation.

If the water is allowed to overflow in the tub of an upstairs bathroom for five minutes it is a fairly simple matter to "mop up" when you turn off the tap. But if you let it overflow for six years and then turn off the tap, you have a tremendous amount of pumping to do before you get the house dry again. And long after you have pumped enough to take up the water in sight you find water pouring in from the interior of the walls and from other unexpected places—this is assuming a very strong house which doesn't collapse entirely.

LEGISLATION CONTROLLING DETAILS UNSATISFACTORY

The real remedy lies in control of the money market by sound Federal reserve policy. The crux of the matter is therefore not to be found in detailed points relating to procedure in placing brokers' loans, or with respect to security affiliates, or loans on securities or similar matters. If credit is not excessive, most of the abuses will disappear. It is desirable that good bankers should have freedom of action to use their best judgment. Bad bankers get their inning when funds are excessive and when the speculative spirit runs wild. The commercial customers of banks have first call on loan funds. If the total of loan funds is not excessive, the stock market will not get too much.

BRANCH BANKING FORCED ON STATES THAT OBJECT TO IT

Here, as elsewhere in the Glass bill, there is a striking at symptoms rather than causes. The assumption that our banking troubles in the past few years are due to unit banking is pure assumption. Branch banking systems and unit banking systems alike have suffered in the great world crisis. When a great branch banking system gets into trouble, the consequences are very widespread indeed. In several foreign countries this has necessitated the placing of the credit of the government behind the banks, and in some countries the burden has been too heavy for the governments, with the result of impaired public credit and currency depreciation. Our unit banking system, like everything else in our financial machinery, was perverted and demoralized by the appalling expansion of bank credit based on excess reserves.

The passage of this provision would force a very undesirable competition among great banks in major cities for the acquisition of branches throughout their States. The more conservative bankers would enter it reluctantly but would be forced into it "to protect their positions." The requirement that the Federal Reserve Board give its approval could not be an adequate safeguard, since the Federal Reserve Board could not play favorites among banks. Concretely, it seems to me definitely undesirable that the great banks of the city of New York should be reaching out over the State of New York, and for 50 miles into New Jersey, with an occasional foray into Connecticut, in such a competitive struggle.

SECURITY AFFILIATES OF BANKS

Before the great chartered banks developed security affiliates, the business of underwriting securities was primarily in the hands of a few great private bankers. Complaints of a "money trust," of a capital market virtually closed to all who would not deal with a few great private bankers, were frequently made. The charges were exaggerated but contained an element of truth. The security affiliates of great banks, chartered by the Federal Government or by the States, have undoubtedly introduced a needed competitive element.

This has been done without putting the funds of the depositors of the banks at the risks of the market. The security affiliate, separately capitalized, risks its own funds but not the bank's funds in underwritings.

In the period from 1924 to 1929, when the whole financial picture was distorted by the startling excess of money-market funds, the security affiliates of banks, as well as private investment bankers, made many mistakes and contributed to the overissue of securities. The mistakes are admitted. One of the chief activities to-day of the great security affiliates, as of the stronger private banking houses, is trying to rectify the mistakes and to salvage as much as can be salvaged for the unfortunate investors who bought the securities that were overissued during this period. Many of the foreign loans issued during this period were brought out by small houses which are no longer in existence. The affiliates of the great chartered institutions to-day have agents in foreign countries, not making new loans, but working to see to it, as far as may be, that coupons are collected and amortization payments made.

That security affiliates and other corporate affiliates of great banks should be examined and regulated by the authorities which charter the great banks themselves is thoroughly desirable. But that, properly examined and regulated, they have a distinct and useful place in our financial system, seems also clear. To abolish the issue of new securities, in a country whose business is so largely in the hands of corporations accustomed to obtaining new capital from the public for the expansion of business, would clearly be industrial suicide. To throw the issue of securities back into the hands of private bankers little subject to public authority, as proposed in the Glass bill, could hardly improve the picture.

LIMITATIONS ON LOANS TO CONSOLIDATED BUSINESSES

The provision that in lending to a consolidated business and to its subsidiaries the loan limit of 10 per cent of the capital and surplus of the bank shall be construed as covering the total of loans to the corporation and to all of its subsidiaries is a purely arbitrary provision which would seriously hamper regular commercial banking. The decision here is one for the credit man in the individual case. Legislation can not create good credit analysis, and arbitrary legislation with respect to these matters is greatly to be deplored.

UNREASONABLE LIMITATIONS ON BANK INVESTMENTS IN BONDS

The Glass bill forbids member banks to underwrite bonds or to buy and sell bonds for their own account but permits the comptroller to allow certain purchases of investment securities under the following restriction: The total amount of any issue of any one obligor or maker shall not exceed at any time 10 per cent of the total amount of such issue outstanding.

The Chase Economic Bulletin has for many years contended that, as a result of the excess cheap money running far beyond the needs of commerce, member banks were buying altogether too many bonds. Bank investment policy, like everything else in the financial system, was distorted, and the consequent losses of banks on bond account have been fearful. This is particularly true of the smaller banks and country banks, which bought many bonds with high yield and narrow market. The great city banks, sacrificing yield to safety and liquidity, bought a much higher percentage of Government securities and short maturities. But here, as elsewhere, the Glass bill aims at symptoms rather than causes.

As a general rule of investment policy, a bank would not ordinarily buy more than 10 per cent of any one issue, but circumstances can easily arise where a large bank might be justified in buying the whole of a particular issue. A bank might have a loan to a business corporation made in anticipation of the placing of a bond issue and the state of the bond market might preclude a public issue. The bank might very well improve its position by accepting an issue of bonds from the borrower in place of the slow loan. It is a question of judgment.

The next few years will see, as is always true after crises, many reorganizations in which banks, and creditors' committees of several banks, will be obliged to accept what payment they can get from customers who are hard pressed and unable to meet maturing loans. The bank policy is to keep such debtors "going concerns," if the management is good, rather than force them into bankruptcy, and it is often wise to put the debt into funded form rather than to have floating debt imperil the life of the business at every maturity. These bonds, held by the bank or banks through several years, while the corporation is improving its position, putting earnings back into surplus, and accumulating a margin of capital, ultimately may become good marketable securities. This new section will impair the bond market a great deal, lessen the salability of bonds, and force the withdrawal from the bond market of very important and useful trading activities of great well-informed banks.

Finally, it will lessen sharply the ability of banks to aid in crises. It is absolutely necessary at times that the great banks should be in a position to underwrite refunding bond issues when great railroads or industrial corporations have large maturities in crises. A case in point is the refunding issues of $230,000,000 of the Great Northern and Northern Pacific Railroads in 1921, which would have been a failure, with disastrous consequences to the country, if the great banks had not helped out.

Many deviations from regular banking policy are called for in crises. The writer welcomes the provisions of the Glass bill giving greater supervisory authority to the comptroller and the Federal reserve authorities in these matters. But he protests against legal restrictions which would hamper the comptroller, Federal reserve authorities, and banks, all three, in the concerted measures which they take in times of public emergency.

BLUE, PINK, AND YELLOW MONEY

The Glass bill proceeds on the theory that it is possible to keep different kinds of money in water-tight compartments and, in particular, to make money scarce and dear for stock-market purposes while keeping it cheap for commercial uses. The earlier Glass bill proposed to accomplish this by requiring the Federal reserve banks to refuse rediscounts to member banks for the purpose of lending on securities or carrying loans on securities. The new bill contains a rather feeble authorization to the Federal reserve authorities to do this—a power which they already had and which the Federal reserve authorities, in an announcement dated February 7, 1929, asserted but used ineffectively.

But loans and discounts to member banks constitute only one of three ways in which Federal reserve credit is expanded. In the autumn of 1928, when the Federal reserve banks were trying to hold down stock-market speculation, they made large purchases of acceptances representing commercial transactions. The stock exchange got the money. There is nothing in the Glass bill to prevent a recurrence of this. The Glass bill would not in any way have restricted the stock-exchange boom of 1924 based on Federal reserve open-market purchases in that year. The Glass bill would in no way have interfered with the expansion of Federal reserve credit or the rise in security prices from July, 1927, to February, 1928.

When the Federal reserve authorities put out credit, the first bank to receive it may know that it is new Federal reserve credit, and, wishing to obey the spirit of the law, may refrain from employing the money in security loans. It may use it to buy Government securities or even commercial paper. But as the money passes on to another bank its identity is absolutely lost in the general stream of funds. The second bank, with a clear conscience, lends its money at the money post of the stock exchange. The money is blue when the Federal reserve bank puts it out, it becomes pink in the possession of the first bank, but it becomes definitely yellow once it gets into the hands of the second bank.

There has grown up an appalling fear of raising rediscount rates to restrict speculation or for any other purpose, and the theory persists that money can be kept in water-tight compartments, cheap for commerce and dear for speculation. The fact is that any restriction of money for speculative uses must involve a general tightening of money.

CONTROL OF THE MONEY MARKET

If the total of money-market funds is excessive, speculative abuses will arise. Efforts to control the direction of funds are, in the first place, largely futile; and, in the second place, if effective, constitute no safeguard against dangerous speculation, because that can arise in every imaginable field. Security speculation was conspicuous in 1928–29; but commodity speculation, financed with excessive credit, was the conspicuous thing in 1919–20. The Glass bill seems to have forgotten 1919–20 and to look only at 1928–29.

The heart of the problem is in the control of the total of money-market funds. The technique of this control is old and well known. It consists in keeping rediscount rates above the market rates for the particular kind of paper rediscounted and in using open-market operations for the purpose of taking up slack as well as for the purpose of relieving tension in the money market. Open-market policy and discount-rate policy must work together. Open-market policy can be effective in checking overexpansion of credit only if buttressed behind a rediscount rate above the market. It is to these matters that the Glass bill should address itself if it wishes to prevent a repetition of speculative abuses in the future.

INCREASED SUPERVISION BY THE COMPTROLLER AND FEDERAL RESERVE AUTHORITIES

The writer sympathizes with the Glass bill's provisions which increase supervisory powers on the part of the Federal reserve system and the Comptroller of the Currency. Security affiliates should be subject to examination and regulation. The Federal reserve authorities and the comptroller should be able to restrain individual banks engaging in unsound practices and to dismiss bank officials who persist in unsound practices after being warned. The writer is glad to see that in the new version of the Glass bill the committee has accepted the suggestions of the governor of the Federal Reserve Board designed to prevent the arbitrary use of these increased supervisory powers

TAXING GOOD BANKS TO LIQUIDATE POOR ONES

That the Government should compel the member banks to subscribe their shareholders' money to stock in a corporation to liquidate failed banks is absolutely unjust. The term "guaranty of bank deposits" is not used in the Glass bill, but the proposal pretty clearly points in that direction. Various States have tried the guaranty of bank deposits. The results have been disastrous. Bad bankers have enjoyed public confidence because of the guaranty fund behind them, and, in their failures, they have exhausted the guaranty funds.

The stock which the banks are compelled to buy can not possibly be a good investment. The liquidating corporation is handicapped from the start. It can incur substantial losses, but it can not make substantial profits to offset these losses, because if it makes profits from selling the assets which it purchases from a failed bank, it is obliged to return the profit to the receiver of the failed bank, less an 8 per cent liquidation fee.

POLITICAL VERSUS BANKING CONTROL OF THE FEDERAL RESERVE SYSTEM

The original Federal reserve act was meant to accomplish a compromise between banking control and Government control of the Federal reserve system. All the developments since have been in the direction of increasing political control. To support the credit of the Government during the war, all elements willingly surrendered to the policy of the Treasury. The Federal reserve board, politically appointed, has increasingly asserted authority over the Federal reserve banks. The Glass bill seems designed to intensify this and to make the Federal reserve system almost wholly political, though it will reduce Treasury control through eliminating the Secretary of the Treasury from the Federal Reserve Board. I believe that the Federal reserve system should be freed from political control and that it should be guided by technical banking principles, administered by trained bankers. I believe that many of the new regulatory functions which are being given to the Federal reserve system by the new legislation would be better handled by the individual Federal reserve banks than by the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, the first part of the bill defines what an affiliate of a bank is and defines it on such broad lines that it will probably take in some companies as affiliates of banks which are neither controlled by the banks nor are subject to their dictation, and therefore may refuse to allow a bank examiner to examine their affairs, and under these circumstances would place the banks in a position where, from no fault of their own, their charters may be forfeited.

On page 8 of Senate bill 4412, lines 5 to 19, State member banks are urged to come into the Federal reserve system on the promise that all the rights contained in their charter would remain unabridged. This section would force the State banks to part with stocks worth more than $200,000,000 which they now legally hold, in a market which is so depressed that it is doubtful what they could realize on them.

The bill also creates a liquidating corporation. The capital for this corporation is subscribed for as follows: One hundred and twenty-five million dollars out of the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KEAN. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. I have heard the Senator many times express his views with reference to the Government engaging in business, and I assume that he is not in favor of taking $125,000,000 out of the Treasury of the United States and turning it over to the Federal reserve banks. Is that correct?

Mr. KEAN. I am not in favor of taking it away from the member banks, because, as I have said, they have to keep 13 per cent of every dollar they receive, without interest, and this clause would make it necessary for them to keep 16.30 per cent.

Mr. WHEELER. Is the Senator in favor of taking $125,000,000 out of the Treasury of the United States and turning it over to these banks, making a gift to them?

Mr. KEAN. I think I am.

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator thinks he is?

Mr. KEAN. Yes.

Mr. WHEELER. What excuse can the Senator give for taking $125,000,000 out of the Treasury of the United States and giving it to the banks, any more than he could excuse taking $125,000,000 out of the Treasury of the United States and giving it to any other group of individuals?

Mr. KEAN. This, of course, is money that has been paid in by the Federal reserve banks, and the object of this measure is to try to form a liquidating corporation. I would be in favor of the United States lending this money to this corporation, and have the Federal reserve banks paying it back to the United States in full, with interest. I would be in favor of that. But I think that the Federal reserve banks should put up a large part of the money, because they have been very prosperous, they have made a great deal of money out of the member banks, and they are making money all the time. I think they are the people who ought to create this fund to take care of any failed banks.

Mr. WHEELER. I am glad to hear the Senator say that, because I agree thoroughly that the money that is put up ought to be paid out of the Federal reserve banks, but that it should not be taken out of the Treasury of the United States. There is no more justification for appropriating $125,000,000 or $150,000,000 out of the Treasury of the United States and giving it to these banks than there would be for the United States Steel Co., or a railroad company, saying, "I have paid in so much money in taxes, and now I want you to appropriate $125,000,000 and give it to me." Or for farmers to say, "We paid taxes, and we think they were illegal, and now, after having paid them in, we want a gift of $125,000,000."

Mr. KEAN. We have already loaned a large sum of money to the farmers.

Mr. WHEELER. I am not objecting, if it is the policy to lend it to them. That is quite different. But to make an outright gift to them I think is indefensible.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, if the Senator will offer an amendment providing that this money shall be loaned at 4 per cent interest, I shall be glad to vote for such an amendment.

Mr. WHEELER. I have no objection to making a loan, but I say that for Congress to appropriate money out of the Treasury of the United States and give it to the banks, just on the theory that they have paid it in and that we are going to give it back, can not be justified, and it will come to meet every man who votes for such an appropriation.

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Jersey yield to me?

Mr. KEAN. I yield.

Mr. WALCOTT. For the sake of accuracy of the record, I would like to explain to the Senator from Montana that while this is a contribution from the Federal Treasury of $125,000,000, it comes out of a fund in the Treasury which has belonged to the Federal reserve system. It is not given directly to the banks, but to the liquidating corporation, so called, which is to be set up, and the capital of which is to be formed, not only by the contribution from the Federal Treasury but by a contribution amounting to one-eighth of 1 per cent of the deposits of the member banks, which will subscribe this amount in case it is asked for to this liquidating corporation, to establish a fund as a guaranty to the depositors of failed banks within the system. I say that merely to straighten the record.

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator is not straightening the record, because this means $125,000,000, or whatever the sum is, which belongs to the Government of the United States, and the proposal is to take $125,000,000 which belongs to the Government of the United States and appropriate it as a gift to this corporation which is proposed to be organized. I say it can not be justified on either a moral or a legal basis.

Mr. WALCOTT. The part I wanted to correct with the Senator from Montana was his claim that this money was to be given to the banks. This is to be given to a new corporation to be set up, and it is for the sake of protecting the deposits of failed banks; and a very much milder form of protecting failed banks than the bill which has recently been proposed in the House for the guarantee of bank deposits.

Mr. WHEELER. What justification is there for taking $125,000,000 out of the Treasury and giving it to the banks, money which has been paid into the Treasury of the United States, taking it out and giving it to this corporation? As the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN] has said, the Federal reserve bank is very wealthy. I am not familiar with the figures, but they themselves are the ones who have given that information. I am very much opposed to the proposal, and still say that it can not be justified on any basis.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Jersey yield to me?

Mr. KEAN. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. The justification of it is that the Federal Treasury never should have received a dollar of that money. Speaking of the equities of the case, the Federal Government never rendered any service for a dollar of the more than $150,000,000 it derived from the profits of the Federal reserve banks.

Mr. WHEELER. If the Senator from New Jersey will pardon a further interruption, let me say that I violently disagree with the Senator from Virginia with reference to his statement that the Federal Government has not rendered any service to these banks, because everybody who knows anything about the banking system knows that the Government of the United States, when it gives them the privilege of issuing money and lending that money at interest, is rendering a service to the banks of this country. To say that this money was wrongly paid in is just like having somebody come and say that the United States Steel Co. wrongfully paid in too much in the way of taxes because we formerly taxed them too much and that now we ought to give the money back.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. KEAN. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I want to say with reference to what the Senator from Montana said that when the Government grants the right to a corporation to issue money it grants the greatest privilege which can be given to any corporation.

Mr. GLASS. As a matter of textual fact, the Government grants no such right to a Federal reserve bank. It is a Government note, and the text of the law says it shall be so considered as a note of the United States, so that the Federal Government simply uses the Federal reserve bank as an instrumentality for issuing the Government notes.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. KEAN. I yield.

Mr. BLAINE. Is not this the situation, that the Federal reserve system issues two classes of circulating medium, one a Federal reserve note and the other a Federal reserve bank note? The Federal reserve bank notes have back of them Government bonds.

Mr. KEAN. The member banks have a right to use the 2 per cent bonds of the United States for the purpose of issuing notes to a limited extent, but those are the old notes that they had a right to issue prior to the establishment of the Federal reserve banks.

Mr. BLAINE. But the Federal reserve bank notes, of which $2,800,000,000 is outstanding, are backed by Federal bonds.

Mr. KEAN. Not the Federal reserve notes.

Mr. BLAINE. No; the Federal reserve bank notes.

Mr. KEAN. No; the member bank notes.

Mr. GLASS. The Senator from Wisconsin is exactly right. The Federal reserve banks under the law have acquired several million dollars of bonds with a circulating privilege by purchase from the member banks. The Senator from Wisconsin is exactly right. There are two species of notes, one which is called the Federal reserve notes, which are really in the text of the law designated as Government notes, and the other Federal reserve bank notes issued upon the basis of the bonds acquired by purchase by the Federal reserve banks from the member banks.

Mr. KEAN. But they also are member bank notes.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield further——

Mr. KEAN. Certainly.

Mr. BLAINE. After confirmation by the Senator from Virginia of my understanding of the matter, the Federal reserve notes, of which there are outstanding about $3,000,000,000, are all guaranteed by the Government of the United States, are they not?

Mr. KEAN. Practically.

Mr. BLAINE. In other words, if the Federal reserve system defaulted—that is, if whatever bank issued the notes defaulted on those Federal reserve notes—then the holders of those notes would have a right to go to the Treasury of the United States and demand from the Treasurer the full amount of the notes in gold. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. KEAN. I do not know that they would have the right to demand. They might ask.

Mr. BLAINE. They may demand, since the Government has guaranteed them. I think I can assure the Senator on behalf of the Government that if he holds a Government note and the issuing institution has defaulted and is insolvent, if he walks down to the office of Mr. Ogden Mills and presents those notes he will receive currency or gold, whichever he requests, 100 cents on the dollar.

Mr. KEAN. In currency.

Mr. BLAINE. I was giving the Senator assurance, and I think I am correct. The Government having obligated itself as accommodation maker, putting it that way, or as guarantor and as well the surety, why should not the system pay something to the Government inasmuch as the Government holds the entire bag under the circumstances?

Mr. KEAN. I agree entirely with the Senator from Wisconsin that they should; but there are also member bank notes outstanding, and the Government keeps a fund on hand to redeem any of those notes if any bank should fail. If the Senator could get the old charters of all the national banks that have failed and get the Government to make good on its guaranty on those notes, I think the Senator would get a very handsome sum of money.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Does the Senator from New Jersey yield further to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. KEAN. I yield.

Mr. BLAINE. The national-bank notes issued by national banks——

Mr. KEAN. That is what I am talking about.

Mr. BLAINE. Those notes are backed up by the Government of the United States. That is, the national bank puts up bonds of the United States. Those bonds are payable in gold. Those bonds bear a certain rate of interest. Under the usual and customary practice that has prevailed in the past that rate of interest has been rather small. It is only 2 or 2¼ per cent.

Mr. KEAN. Two per cent.

Mr. BLAINE. The Government is paying the national banks 2 per cent on the circulating medium which the bank issues.

Mr. KEAN. Oh, no.

Mr. BLAINE. Indirectly it is paying 2 per cent to the banks on the bonds that have been put up and against which the circulating medium is issued.

Mr. KEAN. The trouble with the Senator's statement is, in the first place, that the Treasury always keeps 10 per cent of the notes here in Washington so that the banks only get 90 per cent. It figures out less than 90 per cent, because the Treasury keeps 10 per cent here in order to redeem any note that may be sent down here for redemption.

Mr. BLAINE. If the Senator will permit another interruption, my impression was that it was 5 per cent, though I may be mistaken in that.

Under the Glass-Steagall bill there may be issued circulating medium backed by 40 per cent gold and 60 per cent Government bonds. Those bonds may be any Government bonds, Government bonds that bear a rate of interest as high as 4 or 4¼ per cent per annum. On those bonds the Government is paying that rate of interest, and the system is entitled to issue circulating medium against those bonds to the amount of 60 per cent of the bonds. Sixty per cent of 4 or 4¼ per cent would be about 2.48 or 2.50, I will say for convenience. The Government pays interest in effect, indirectly, of course, upon that circulating medium and the Government is responsible for those notes. The Government must redeem those notes. Why should the Government be the guarantor, the surety, the accommodation maker, without some compensation, without something that would compensate the Government of the United States in case it was called upon to redeem any of the circulating medium? I think I have stated the situation correctly. I hope the Senator will give us the benefit of his views.

Mr. KEAN. The Government does receive something, because it receives taxes.

Mr. BLAINE. Does the Senator refer to that class of taxes which all citizens must pay under like conditions?

Mr. KEAN. No; I am talking about taxes on banks. There are other taxes which the Government receives.

Mr. BLAINE. Does the Senator refer to the one-half of 1 per cent tax on the circulating medium?

Mr. KEAN. Yes.

Mr. BLAINE. It is proposed to do away with that, as I understand.

Mr. KEAN. I do not know. That is not proposed in this bill.

Mr. BLAINE. The proposal is to repeal that part of the Federal reserve act which imposes the franchise tax, as I understand it.

Mr. KEAN. Perhaps the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] would answer that question.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, as a matter of fact the Government's responsibility is a mere figure of speech imposed upon the banks of the country over their unanimous protest. It does not amount to a thrip, because the notes issued would be redeemed twenty times over again before they ever reached the United States Treasury for redemption as a Government obligor. It is a mere figure of speech put in the bill by the late William J. Bryan, who was at that time Secretary of State. I have recited a very interesting incident touching that particular point.

I protested to the President of the United States against calling these notes "Government notes." I pointed out to him that behind the notes was the individual responsibility of the unit bank, the double liability of the stockholders of the unit bank, the double liability of the Federal reserve bank, and all of the assets of all 12 of the Federal reserve banks combined. Those were all behind the so-called Government notes.

I called his attention to the fact that nobody ever before in the history of the world knew anything about a Government note that could not be issued except upon the demand of a bank. His response was, indicating to me that there was a misconception of Mr. Wilson as a practical politician, "GLASS, that is all true; but if we can retain the substance and give the other fellow the shadow in order to pass your bank bill, why not do it?" I did so for that reason.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, the Senator from New Jersey has been very generous in yielding, but in this connection will he suffer just another short interruption?

Mr. KEAN. Certainly.

Mr. BLAINE. I would like to inquire of the Senator from Virginia if he regards as a figure of speech or a shadow the interest the Government is paying on bonds which are hypothecated for the purpose of issuing this circulating medium?

Mr. GLASS. Oh, no; it is very real—not particularly real either—but it is nominal. The advantage that the Government derives from the system which it has established is vastly greater than the inconsequential interest that it pays on the bonds.

As I undertook to point out day before yesterday, the actual service, the practical service performed by the Federal reserve bank for the Government without one cent of compensation exceeds, I would say, twenty times over again the worth of any privilege that the banks derive from the Government.

Mr. KEAN. The Government keeps its deposits with those banks, and that is of some value.

Mr. GLASS. Oh, the Government keeps its deposits in innumerable banks.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, if the Senator from New Jersey will pardon me——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. KEAN. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. Assuming that the Senator's statement is absolutely correct——

Mr. GLASS. It is absolutely correct.

Mr. WHEELER. I do not agree that these banks do not have a great privilege when they are given a monopoly to operate; but assuming the facts to be as stated, it is proposed to appropriate out of the Treasury of the United States $125,000,000 and give it to a private institution. We are talking about economy and about cutting the wages of poor unfortunate employees who are having a hard time to make a living; we are refusing, if you please, to pass a law to give something to the unemployed in this country who are literally starving, and then Senators have the temerity to stand here on the floor of the Senate and propose to appropriate $125,000,000, in the name, I suppose, of economy. When we are talking about economy, when we are talking about balancing the Budget, and when we are going to cut down the wages of employees, stenographers, and everybody else in the effort to balance the Budget, I say it is outrageous to take $125,000,000 out of the Treasury and give it to a private institution.

Mr. GLASS. Yet I suspect, Mr. President, that the Senator from Montana was one of the Senators who voted for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill, which appropriated $200,000,000 out of the Federal Treasury to take care of the deposits in banks over which the Government has no supervision at all.

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator is entirely mistaken in assuming that I voted for that bill.

Mr. GLASS. I may be mistaken, and therefore I said I simply suspected; but the Senate itself voted for it, the other House voted for it, the President approved it, and it is now the law.

Mr. WHEELER. Yes; but that is quite a different thing. As a matter of fact, it amounts to a loan of $200,000,000, while this bill proposes to give almost as large a sum to a private institution.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, I have no doubt that the enactment of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill saved more than 200,000 people their homes, and various other things, and I am glad I voted for it.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him right there?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. KEAN. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. This bill is not for the benefit of the banks; it is for the benefit of the innocent depositors in the banks.

Mr. KEAN. I quite agree with the Senator from Virginia that the provision referred to is for the benefit of the depositors and is an effort to enable them to get back their money.

Mr. WHEELER. Of course, no one is contending otherwise; there is not any question but that many innocent depositors in national banks and in State banks have lost their money, and there are a tremendous number of innocent people in this country to-day who are suffering through no fault of their own.

Mr. KEAN. That is quite right.

Mr. WHEELER. But if the Government of the United States is going to take one special class and turn over $125,000,000 to that class because a certain group who have had money in the banks have lost it, then it ought to go down the line and appropriate money out of the Treasury of the United States and give it to every innocent person who has lost money through no fault of his own.

Mr. KEAN. As I told the Senator, I do not want to give it at all but want to lend it.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. KEAN. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. This bill does not provide, does it, that the $125,000,000 shall be used to pay depositors in failed banks now, but that it shall be used to build up a fund with which to pay depositors of failed banks in the future?

Mr. KEAN. No, Mr. President; the $125,000,000 fund is derived in part from the Federal Treasury, in part from the subscriptions which the Federal reserve banks make, and from the subscriptions which the member banks make; and the fund thus collected can be used to pay depositors in banks that are now closed or that may close hereafter.

Under the bill the receiver of a failed bank may tender its assets to the liquidating corporation, on the basis of such valuation as may be agreed upon by a valuation committee composed of the receiver, a member selected by the directors of the bank, and a third member agreed upon by the receiver and the member thus selected. If the offer is sufficiently attractive, the liquidating corporation may give the receiver the money so that he can pay off in part the depositors of the failed bank. If the net amount realized by the liquidating corporation from the sale of the assets of the closed bank exceeds the amount originally paid to the receiver, the excess, after deducting a liquidating fee of 8 per cent, is returned to the receiver of the bank, so that he may distribute it as an additional dividend to the depositors. It is a very important provision of the bill. I am not sure that it will work, but I should like to see it work. I should like it arranged so that when a bank closes within 30 days 40 or 50 or 60 per cent of the deposits could be paid at once. I should be glad to vote for any bill which would bring about such a result that the depositors would not have to wait for a long time during which claims might be filed against the bank and long delays ensue. If there could be some way devised so that if a bank fails its depositors within 30 days could get 50 per cent of their money, thus enabling them to continue in business or to use it for their household necessities, I would be enthusiastic for such a measure.

Mr. President, I have recited the manner in which the liquidating corporation is formed under the provisions of the bill. Member banks are required to subscribe to its stock to the extent of one-eighth per cent of the total of their outstanding time and demand deposits as of July 1, 1932.

Mr. President, in the cities where Federal reserve banks are located there have been erected buildings, some of which might be described as palaces, for the respective Federal reserve banks; they have usually the finest offices in any town. The profit of the Federal reserve bank is largely derived from the poor little member banks that are in practical slavery to the Federal reserve system. The Federal reserve banks have made large sums of money. I can not state it as a fact, because I can not prove it, but it is probable that thousands of banks which have failed would not have failed if the Federal reserve system had allowed them 2 or 2½ per cent on the money which they were obliged to keep on deposit with the Federal reserve system.

For every dollar that the banks receive at the present time in deposits they have to keep a reserve, and what they keep in the Federal reserve bank and what they have to keep in cash amounts to 13 per cent. If this bill passes in its present form, it will make the country banks put up sixteen and a little over a quarter per cent of every dollar they receive from their depositors in the Federal reserve bank or keep it in cash, so that they will not be able to earn as much as heretofore. What a tremendous amount of money will be taken out of the little banks on which they will earn no interest!

Mr. METCALF. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. KEAN. I yield.

Mr. METCALF. Will not the amount be something like $70,000,000 that will thus be taken out of the banks?

Mr. KEAN. It will be a great deal more than that.

Mr. WALCOTT. It figures out about $112,000,000 on the basis of a subscription of a quarter of 1 per cent.

Mr. KEAN. On the basis of a quarter of 1 per cent, the amount of $112,000,000 will be taken from the small country banks and the big city banks. I am particularly speaking of the small country banks, for to them the Federal reserve system renders practically no service, though the small country banks are obliged to keep deposits there. If some one would propose it, I should be glad to vote for an amendment providing that every bank that did not borrow money from the Federal reserve banks should obtain interest on its money on deposit.

It is provided that the liquidating corporation shall be a depositary of public moneys, except of receipts from customs. It also may be employed as a fiscal agent for the Government, and it shall perform all such reasonable duties as depositary of public money and financial agent for the Government as may be required of it. Mr. President, I can not see, for the life of me, why it is desired to put in this bill a provision that the liquidating corporation shall be a Government depositary and that it shall be a fiscal agent of the Government. The Federal reserve banks are already that, and why should there be in this bill a provision that the liquidating corporation shall be a fiscal agent of the Government and receive deposits of public moneys and act as financial agent of the Government, I can not see.

This bill also very largely increases the power of the Comptroller of the Currency. The bill in its present form will further cause deflation in the market because of the necessity of the banks parting with their present portfolio securities.

Mr. President, I think I have shown what this bill will do. I feel that in its present form it will do a great deal of harm to the banking system of the United States. We have passed two bills here—the Glass bill and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill—which have helped the situation tremendously. I feel that the passage of the bill in its present form will be a backward step and an injury to the financial interests of the country.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat, I desire to say that I was interested in the suggestion he made that the bill would bring about further deflation. I assume that the Senator has in mind the restrictions respecting the use of Federal reserve credit in the stock market.

Mr. KEAN. I have in mind that member banks organized under the various State laws—State banks—have more than $200,000,000 of stocks which, under this bill, they would have to sell at once; that many banks have bond departments in which they are holding bonds at the present time, although they may have gone down—they may be city bonds; they may be State bonds; they may be United States bonds—and they would have to do away with those bond departments. They would have to sell their bonds; and so, from step to step, taking it all together, there would be a tremendous amount of liquidation under this bill.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for another question?

Mr. KEAN. Surely.

Mr. BLAINE. Assuming that we get out of the present depression within the next 12 or 18 months—of course, that is a violent assumption, but for the purpose of my question I am making that assumption—would this bill, by reason of its restriction on the use of Federal reserve credit, retard the development of industry?

Mr. KEAN. Surely.

Mr. BLAINE. Would it retard the development of new industry through the possibility of the new industry being unable to market its stocks and bonds, its securities? I should like to have the opinion of the Senator on that question.

Mr. KEAN. In my opinion, one of the troubles with this bill is that it will eliminate all the distributors of securities, and that there will be no distributor of securities of large amounts with the exception of J. P. Morgan & Co. This bill is of such a nature that the only concern that will be able to take an issue of United States bonds or take an issue of any other large sum of money will be J. P. Morgan & Co.

Mr. BLAINE. That is, the Senator's view is that in issuing securities for new industries those who were organizing and promoting the new industries would find no place to go for credit except to the house of Morgan?

Mr. KEAN. That is my opinion, Mr. President.

Mr. BLAINE. Will the Senator tell me—perhaps I ought not to ask him this question——

Mr. KEAN. Go on.

Mr. BLAINE. It is probably due to my own failure to grasp the whole situation, but I should like to have the Senator's discussion as far as he wants to go upon the proposition as to how the bill would have the effect of directing all new industry to a large financial organization like the house of Morgan instead of to the credit possibilities of the Federal reserve system.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, at the present time most of the large banks have an affiliate which they have built up in the last 10 years with salesmen and customers who go out and distribute these securities. These men go from town to town, and they are known. They are known to the investor, and the consequence is that the banks that own these affiliates can and do distribute a large part of the securities that are issued in this country.

For instance, if we take any one of the cities, they have to get a syndicate together composed of half a dozen of these banks to take twenty-five or twenty millions of their bonds, and that is the only way in which they can distribute them. If we do away with the tools that are now used to distribute these securities, naturally practically the only tool of any size that will be left will be Messrs. J. P. Morgan & Co. It would be necessary to go to them; and whatever their price was it would have to be met.

Mr. BLAINE. Will the Senator yield for another question? We bolsheviks, radicals, and perhaps we might be characterized by some other name, such as "sons of wild jackasses," usually refer to the house of Morgan, but we are told that that is just a fiction, that there is no such thing as the house of Morgan. The Senator understands that the Bankers' Trust Co. organization with some $26,000,000,000 of assets, the Guaranty Trust organization with some $28,000,000,000 of assets, the National City Bank with something like $18,000,000,000 of assets, and the Chase National Bank with something like $33,000,000,000 of assets, all have a community of interest with the organization that we call the house of Morgan. Is that the Senator's understanding?

Mr. KEAN. Does the Senator want me to reply to that?

Mr. BLAINE. I should be glad to have the Senator's opinion.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, I will go back a good many years.

Years ago there were two dry-goods houses up in Hartford, Conn. Mr. Peabody, of London, who during the Civil War floated most of the United States bonds in London, came over here and was looking for a partner. He said that he was getting old, that he had lost touch with the business of the United States, and that he wanted a young partner who would be in touch with the merchants of the United States. He asked Mr. George Bliss whether he would not become a partner of his. Mr. Bliss was a partner of Mr. Levi P. Morton, who afterwards became Vice President of the United States.

Mr. Bliss said no; that he did not want to go to London, but that he knew a young man named Junius Morgan, who was a merchant in Hartford, and that he would recommend him as a partner for Mr. Peabody. So, Mr. Junius Morgan went over to London and became a partner of Mr. Peabody. Mr. Peabody died without children, and Mr. Junius Morgan organized the firm of J. S. Morgan & Co. of London. He had a son named J. Pierpont Morgan, who went to college in Germany, and he telegraphed to his father that he had an opportunity of becoming professor of mathematics in this German university. His father telegraphed back to him that he had something else for him to do besides becoming a professor of mathematics in a German university. So he sent him over to this country, and in a few years he had an opportunity, and he became a partner of Mr. Anthony Drexel. The firm was Drexel, Morgan & Co. After that it became J. P. Morgan & Co. Mr. Morgan could run up three columns of figures just as easily as he could run up one. He built up the firm so that it became the largest banking firm in New York.

Of course, anybody making security issues and doing business on a very large scale has friends and opportunities of giving favors or interests to various banks and various individuals, and everybody in business is anxious to get what may be a "plum." That is, they may be able to make a little money out of an interest in this bond issue or that bond issue. The consequence is that there is that community of interest, if the Senator means that—not financially, but a community of interest whereby they get favors from one another, and the consequence is that J. P. Morgan & Co. divide the risk.

Say that they take $20,000,000 of a security issue. Say that they divide that up so that their risk is four or five millions of dollars, and the rest is distributed around. They get a commission on it first, but it is distributed around so that nobody has any more risk than four or five million dollars. That is called a syndicate. They manage the syndicate; they sell the bonds; you get interest on your money, and a check, probably, for a small profit.

Everybody is anxious to go into these syndicates. Everybody is anxious to have a share in this business, and everybody helps sell the bonds. That is the interest that the Senator calls the house of Morgan; but the National City Bank, the Guaranty Co., and the Chase Bank, through Harris, Forbes & Co., may originate a syndicate, and they may give a share to Morgan.

Of course, what we want in this country is this: We want several concerns that will compete against each other to bid for these blocks of city bonds or blocks of industrial bonds, so that there will be an incentive for them to pay the highest price that the city or the industry can get for its bonds. That is what we want to have; that is what we want to receive; and if this bill is passed as it is, all chance of having this competition will be wiped out.

Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks the articles from the French papers by Mr. H. Parker Willis, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

THE MISSION OF MESSRS. FARNIER AND LACOUR-GAYET—A FRANCO-AMERICAN MONETARY AND BANKING AGREEMENT IS REALIZED

WASHINGTON, October 17.—I learn from a good source that Messrs. Farnier and Lacour-Gayet have arrived at an agreement with the authorities of the Federal reserve system. The Bank of France will leave here available deposits valued between two hundred and three hundred million dollars; two hundred millions will be freed on earmarked gold. The Federal reserve bank, to remain in line with this agreement, must be induced to raise the discount rate to 4 per cent, and even higher, and ask to practice a better selection of commercial paper to protect the gold coin and bullion, avoiding all securities not bankable or difficult to negotiate.

An investigation has shown that the amount of foreign credits still open here is $1,200,000,000 and that of American credits abroad is $600,000,000.

I might add that the American Government is paying respect to the attitude of France and is disposed to lend a favorable ear to Mr. Laval's proposals on various important subjects.

(October 14, 1931)

THE MISSION OF MESSRS. FARNIER AND LACOUR-GAYET IN NEW YORK

Possible withdrawals of short-term securities of the Bank of France. Messrs. Farnier and Lacour-Gayet arrived here Tuesday and spent the afternoon at the Federal reserve bank.

Financial circles believe they know that the mission of the representatives of the Bank of France consists especially in studying the opportunity of the withdrawal from here of a large part of what remains of the short-term funds belonging to the Bank of France and thus possibly avoid an erroneous interpretation of the conferences with Mr. Laval in case that after his visit these withdrawals are decided upon.

Messrs. Farnier and Lacour-Gayet are said to be also charged with studying the general conditions of our market, to serve as a guide for the policy of the Bank of France in the future. A summary of the financial proposals of President Hoover might also be presented to them in order that they might be led to examine the extent of his suggestions and give their advice to Laval before the conversations.

The indications which I cable you have not an official character, but come from a competent source.

ARRANGEMENTS PROPOSED BY FARNIER AND LACOUR-GAYET APPROVED IN PARIS—INTERVENTION OF THE BANK OF FRANCE IN THE ACCEPTANCE MARKET—GOLD WITHDRAWALS—OPTIMISTIC IMPRESSION OF FRENCH EXPERTS

NEW YORK, October 18.—From a sure source I learn that the Bank of France has ratified the proposal formulated by Messrs. Farnier and Lacour-Gayet to preserve $200,000,000 in gold on the New York market.

The Bank of France is said to have bought to-day $20,000,000 worth of securities, at a time when it had abstained for a long time on the acceptance market. It is probable that it will settle this purchase by means of funds which it has on deposit here.

It appears from certain indications given in Wall Street that some large private Parisian banks do not yet seem completely reassured and will continue to withdraw gold. New and important shipments of metal are foreseen. To-day the shipments of gold have been very small, no large ship departing for France.

French experts are said to have sent very optimistic reports to France. They spent all last Monday afternoon at the Federal reserve bank; the conversations are supposed to have concerned especially the situation of the New York market, and the impression was said to have been good.

THE BANK OF FRANCE AND THE AMERICAN MONEY MARKET—APROPOS OF THE PROGRAM OF THE HOOVER-LAVAL CONVERSATIONS, PUBLISHED IN PARIS

NEW YORK, October 20.—The Bank of France is said to have purchased to-day on the market a new amount of about twenty millions in securities. It has made known to the great financial establishments its desire to see increased by one-half per cent the interest on the funds which it has on deposit in our market.

This request is keenly criticized and discussed by certain bankers who are not disposed to raise the interest rates beyond the level established last week, when the rates on foreign deposits were advanced in conformity with the discount rate of the Federal reserve bank. The request of the Bank of France is attributed to its desire to realize a moderate gain on its deposits after having paid the tax to which it is liable to the French Government.

Certain bankers are said to be inclined to state frankly that they prefer to give up foreign deposits rather than pay a higher interest; some express the opinion that it is not desirable to entice the Bank of France to leave on the New York market the $200,000,000 in gold which have already been the subject of negotiations, and maintain that the situation of the market would be healthier without foreign money. The simple idea that our market has need of any foreign aid irritates certain feelings.

Nevertheless the point of view of the Federal reserve bank is absolutely different and aims to keep here as much gold as possible. The differences of opinion on this subject seem to need rapid solution before the arrival of Mr. Laval. That now constitutes the principal subject of conversation in Wall Street circles, where it is believed that it may lead to an entente on several vital questions; but all that is published on this subject is premature.

The general sentiment is that the program of the projected conversations, as published by the French papers, is, from certain sides, quite deceptive, from the fact that it does not show sufficient comprehension of the practical financial problems, the solution of which seems most urgent here.

THE DIFFICULTIES OF THE LAVAL-HOOVER NEGOTIATIONS—THE ATTITUDE OF AMERICAN POLITICIANS—WASHINGTON LESS OPTIMISTIC THAN NEW YORK—THE GERMAN POINT OF VIEW—THE NEW MORATORIUM—CRITICISMS OF THE ACTION OF THE FEDERAL RESERVE—TOWARD A FRANCO-AMERICAN "ENTENTE CORDIALE" IN THE MONETARY AND BANKING DOMAIN—A COMMUNICTION OF M. LAVAL

WASHINGTON, October 22.—From a preliminary examination of the situation it appears that the task before the two Presidents is difficult. Mr. Hoover has conferred with Senator BORAH and other statesmen. Nothing indicates a change in the well-known attitude of Congress toward the principal problems of security—war debts and armaments. It seems that Mr. Laval and Mr. Hoover will be obliged to maneuver, and it is not possible to say to what point they would be ready to go to avoid cessation of their conferences. If they were obliged to recognize that they were at an impasse, the consequences for Wall Street would be severe.

The optimism concerning the issue of the conversations is much less pronounced in Washington than in New York. Numerous Members of Congress are in the Capital or near by and are following developments from day to day. In their opinion Hoover knows the opinion prevailing in the Congress. This opinion is suspicious and in general hostile toward the establishment of closer relations with Europe. The country is generally opposed to cancellation of the German reparations or interallied debts, fearing a proportional increase in taxes.

It is the general opinion that the maximum which would be permitted by public opinion would be the granting of a 3-year moratorium for debts and reparations.

Numerous German financiers and business men are now in the United States on business. They do not count on tangible results from the conference. They are more interested in the question of the postponement of banking acceptances, whose maturity was only extended until next February.

Statesmen have told me that several criticisms will be made in Congress on the subject of the policy of the Federal reserve system, especially in regard to the granting of credits to Germany and England last summer.

Among the numerous subjects which Laval and Hoover must discuss, two problems seem to have the greatest chance of a useful solution in the form of an "entente cordiale," the circulation of gold and questions of a monetary and banking nature.

NEGOTIATIONS ARE STATED PRECISELY—MR. LAVAL PROCEEDS TO THE "EXPLOITATION OF MINDS" AWAITING AN OFFICIAL STATEMENT ON THE GOLD STANDARD—THE POLITICAL DIFFICULTIES OF MR. HOOVER—TACTICAL ERROR OF MR. FARNIER AND MR. LACOUR-GAYET—INTERALLIED DEBTS AND THE GERMAN MORATORIUM; SOLUTION ENVISAGED—AN OUTBURST BY SENATOR BORAH—MR. LAVAL HOLDS TO HIS POSITIONS

WASHINGTON, October 23 (midnight).—The preliminary consultations create the general impression that Mr. Laval's visit will lead to an official statement on the gold policy, which would include assurance concerning the preservation of the gold standard as well as the defense of the monetary system based on this principle. I believe, although it is not yet certain nor can it be officially confirmed, that the communication on gold will be made before the end of the conference. It is not yet decided up to what point the promises made on this subject will be made public.

At the same time I learn from an authoritative source that the policy of the deposits of the Bank of France and of the gold held in the United States, decreed by Farnier and Lacour-Gayet, has been submitted to the French Government and accepted as satisfactory.

The opinion in diplomatic circles and others concerning the results of the conference beyond the monetary and banking questions, is still skeptical. Discussions can be of only a preliminary character; acts will follow.

A Republican leader who has carefully studied the situation from the point of view of his party, told me that it was, in his opinion, dangerous to give publicity to any political agreements made. Also, it is probable that the conclusions to which the conference leads will not be made public until the opening of the session of Congress. It appears more and more clearly that the circumstances do not lend themselves to radical measures. Political struggles are being prepared and the public is distrustful on the subject of all questions which are being debated.

Another person of great authority told me that the Government is much embarrassed by the attitude of a certain public which expects too much from the Laval-Hoover conversations. * * * The Government hopes to arrive at a better reciprocal comprehension of the two countries in the domain of the principal economic, financial, and political problems, but can not foresee any definite agreement, even in principle, on questions such as disarmament and pacts. An agreement of principle might be concluded on reparations and interallied debts, but, as far as concerns the United States, it would have to be submitted to the approval of Congress.

The true work began to-day at 5 p. m. Only Messrs. Laval, Hoover, Stimson, Mills, and the interpreters, an American and a Frenchman, took part in the conversations.

Mr. Laval is faithful to his methods: he is the only source of communications. The French Premier examines in detail all the questions with the experts, then communicates the conclusions on the basis of the advice expressed by his qualified colleagues.

Up to now, before the conversations at the White House, Mr. Laval has proceeded only to a friendly exchange of views using the indications furnished by the experts. According to the expression of a high American personality, the interviews of the French Premier had for their object "the exploration of minds." It seems that he will continue to follow these same methods during his stay in the United States.

The conversations at dinner in the White House did not have an official character, but the visits made by Laval to the different personages of the financial and political world gave place to an exchange of views, and some impressions were collected. The general atmosphere at Washington is always the same. The sojourn of Mr. Laval at the White House will mark the culminating point of the discussions but it is possible that the real results will not be known for some days; certain details of the proposals will be formulated which will take some time to edit.

I understand that difficulties might arise from the fact that Messrs. Farnier and Lacour-Gayet may have committed the same tactical error as Mr. Montagu Norman did some years ago. The negotiations of the government of the Bank of England failed because in omitting to consult the Federal Reserve Board they failed to recognize the rights of that supreme authority of the Federal reserve system. The directors of certain Federal reserve banks have been accustomed, in recent years, to have little regard for the board, and have pretended that they themselves represent the Federal reserve system in Europe, although they had no right to do so. Under these conditions, it may be that certain questions which appear solved by the visit of Mr. Laval will still remain open after his departure.

I learn from leaders in the Senate and House that strong political influences are at work to induce President Hoover to abandon the idea of asking Mr. Laval to promise a reduction of armaments in proportion or in exchange for a reduction of the war debts of the Allies. Mr. Hoover is also being urged to denounce any request or suggestion of the extension of the moratorium, and to propose a direct diminution of war debts, joined with a corresponding reduction in German reparations payments, even to complete cancellation, in the conviction that Congress would entirely indorse this proposal, a strong group of influential members being disposed to support this policy if it were adopted.

On the other hand, assurances have been given to Mr. Hoover that the business world would welcome such a proposal, seeing in it a real guaranty for relief and real improvement in the general situation.

If it had been possible to induce Mr. Laval to accept a heavy reduction of reparations on this basis, after investigation of Germany's present capacity to pay, he would then have proposed that the latter resume the payments thus determined, beginning next July. It is believed that this combination will be discussed at the conference to-day.

This afternoon Mr. BORAH expressed to the representatives of the American and European press his ideas on the security of France and the guaranties which might be given therefor. Mr. BORAH is a partisan of the cancellation of debts under proper conditions.

(October 27, 1931)

THE FRENCH DELEGATION SATISFIED—THE PRESERVATION OF THE YOUNG PLAN—SHORT-TERM DEBT OF GERMANY AND CONGRESS—WALL STREET AND THE DIFFICULTIES OF CONSTITUTION OF THE NATIONAL CREDIT CORPORATION—SHIPMENTS OF GOLD

Mr. Laval's conferees are more and more satisfied with the results of the conferences, especially with the clause relative to nonintervention in the reparations or moratorium outside the mechanism of the Young plan. American circles, while recognizing the victory from Laval's point of view, indicate that the solution interposed can not bind Congress, which has its own ideas on the whole problem of debts and reparations. A very clear movement is on foot to induce Congress to take a vote on this question, and it is certain that this political movement is going to be accentuated this winter.

What is especially criticized here in the Laval-Hoover agreement is that nothing is said on the subject of the important short-term German debt due next February. The foreign bankers and the Germans themselves would like to settle this affair, but can do nothing without colliding with the provisions concerning the policy of long-term debts. It is probable that this urgent problem will be the subject of discussions in Congress after it assembles, and that the promises given by Mr. Hoover and the agreements made will render the domestic political situation still more difficult.

The heaviness of the market is not directly connected with the Hoover-Laval agreement, but might be due rather to the news concerning the National Credit Corporation, the constitution of which is not progressing rapidly since banking difficulties in the country are increasing.

In Wall Street private and international bankers are satisfied with the results of the conference; the discount banks, on the other hand, fear that the recovery of short-term debts will be made more difficult.

GERMAN PROBLEM: PRIVATE AGREEMENTS—POLITICAL LEADERS AND FINANCIAL DIRECTORS DEMAND THAT WASHINGTON TAKE A POSITION TO HELP DEVELOP THE SLIGHT RECOVERY OF BUSINESS—NATIONAL CREDIT CORPORATION—HOARDING—RISE OF AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS—WEAKNESS OF THE POUND—"STERLING BLOC" AGAINST THE GOLD STANDARD

NEW YORK, November 2.—Since the departure of Mr. Laval, the question of war debts does not cease to be on the order of the day in financial circles. The world of business is already disappointed by the absence of all exact information on the settlement of the German problem, especially short-term debts. Considering the importance of this problem, the opinion prevails that the negotiations must have reached a private and nonofficial agreement, destined to be developed later. Such are the opinions expressed by the directors of finance, well informed on the situation. They add that the conferences which will be held in Paris this week, under the direction of Laval, will inform the public on this subject.

Here are the three things more desired by most financiers: (1) Immediate settlement of the problem of German short-term debts, maturing next February, at the expiration of the "standstill" agreement; (2) indication of the policy to be followed after July; (3) indication on the policy toward the revision of the Young plan. A constant and intense pressure is exerted on the political leaders to obtain a statement on these three points, and one may expect official communications on the attitude of the American Government on this subject at any moment, at least before Congress convenes.

Bankers are more or less resigned to consolidating a part of the German short-term obligations or graduating all the payments over some years. They are likewise disposed to accept some plan for the amendment of an important part of the war debts with corresponding annulment of reparations. I believe that certain bankers are actively occupied with financial projects in connection with the plan, which they will submit, with all the details, to President Hoover. It is the opinion in financial circles that a real revival of business, the settlement of international problems, and all the question of the recovery of credits granted abroad depends upon the official definition of the attitude of Washington toward the desiderata indicated above. As a movement for the restoration of business in the United States, pressure on the part of the financiers to induce the Government to take action is certainly going to be intensified.

It is not necessary to take seriously the statements of Mr. MCFADDEN. He has long been at grips with the directors of finance and makes sensational statements without proving them. His partisans in Congress are very limited.

The last communication of President Hoover considers the diminution of banking failures, cessation of hoarding, of reduction of exportation of gold, and the rise in prime materials. As concerns banking failures, it seems that the runs on the banks for lack of confidence are no longer probable, but it would be premature to say that banking difficulties have entirely ceased. The National Credit Corporation is just organized, and its bureau in various places will be able to aid establishments more or less important, but many small banks will probably remain closed. The withdrawals of gold have only been partially checked, for those who hoard the metal throughout the world continue to drain gold from here, contrary to the wish of the banks of issue. There are not yet any clear indications that hoarding in the United States has ceased. The notes in circulation are diminishing, but that may be due to other causes. Finally, the rise in agricultural products was expected and has nothing to do with the general situation.

The weakness of the pound is attributed to rumors that the British Government has other monetary plans than the direct reestablishment of the gold standard. A cable from London reports the belief there that Great Britain will not return to the gold standard but will establish a régime of managed money, in agreement with all the countries which have abandoned the gold standard and which will form a "sterling bloc" to prevent the money of the countries faithful to the gold standard—especially the dollar and the franc—from being adopted as a base for world commerce. These rumors can not be controlled. The repayment by England of 40 per cent of Franco-American credits indicates also that London is little worried about the preservation of its gold reserve and corroborates the opinion that it does not intend an immediate return to the gold standard.

THE RAILROAD CRISIS AND THE MARKET—AFTER THE WABASH FAILURE—THE QUESTION OF SALARIES—IMPOSITION OF OTHER MEANS OF TRANSPORTATION TO PROTECT THE RAILROADS—HASTY SALES OF INVESTMENT TRUSTS—THE GOVERNMENT EVENTUALLY OBLIGED TO ASSURE THE FUNCTIONING OF CERTAIN SYSTEMS—THE PROBLEM OF THE GERMAN SHORT-TERM DEBTS

NEW YORK, December 2.—At the middle of this week the market is in a more depressed state than at the end of the preceding week. The pessimism of numerous operators knows no limits. A useful discovery is made in these conditions. The weakness of railroad securities and the conditions of the railroads are the dominant preoccupations. The receipts of the railroads continue to diminish, and the market value of stocks and railroad bonds is dropping rapidly to new levels unknown for years.

The putting of the Wabash Railway under judicial administration is the first important event of this order since the failure some years ago of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul. At the same time the Chicago-Rock Island, after having passed its dividend on common stocks for some time, announced the passing of the dividend on the 7 per cent and 6 per cent preferred.

There is reason to believe that the railroad employees of the West, who met in Chicago last week, will examine more seriously the problem of the reduction of wages. The Wabash Railway, in the hands of a receiver, will certainly reduce them, and the unions of employees will have to decide whether it is right to put other railroads in a similar situation, since the receivers, in their capacity as judiciary administrators, will not hesitate to reduce the wages. Already the Chicago & North Western Railway has announced that it will ask a reduction of 15 per cent. The office of arbitration of the Canadian Government decided to-day to reduce the wages on the Canadian system 10 per cent.

The movements counterbalance up to a certain point the discouraging effect of the passing of dividends and the depression on the stock exchange. But factors of this sort hardly suffice to lighten the pessimistic expectations of a new reaction on the securities market. The investment trusts are especially disturbed and certain ones are completely abandoning the market. They are throwing obligations overboard in order to create available funds in the hope of being able to proceed finally to repurchase them at more advantageous prices.

Congress next week will take up plans for taxation of transportation by trucks, pipe lines, and other means of communication.

The taxes envisaged would be sufficiently heavy to permit the railroads to fight their fatal competition. If Congress refuses to vote the necessary laws, there will be nothing for certain railroads to do but fail, certain experts affirm. In fact, the Government must acquire certain systems in order to resume their operation on a healthy basis. Projects of this sort are gaining ground, although official circles do not generally admit that things are really so or that the immediate prospects have become so menacing. But even these circles are beginning to get worried. * * *

After the rails, it is short-term credits granted to Germany which cause an atmosphere of disquietude among bankers and their clientele. In financial circles here the opinion prevails that the situation in Germany is worse than appears from information in the press. The continual lowering of all German securities reflects the apprehensions on the subject of the payment of the interest on these bonds. Wall Street insists to the authorities that they maintain absolutely the priority of German short-term debts to American bankers.

THE AMERICAN MARKETS BEFORE THE GERMAN PROBLEM—HELP FOR THE RAILROADS—BUDGETARY DEFICITS AND LOAN—A WEEK FULL OF DEVELOPMENTS

NEW YORK, December 6.—The pessimism which has prevailed in Wall Street concerning the menace of Germany's downfall or a coup d'état has been partly dissipated by the telephonic messages received from Berlin by the directors of New York finance. These messages say that no change in the situation of Germany is to be foreseen for the immediate future. The rumor has reached here that Germany would soon abandon the gold standard, but it is indicated from the same source that an event of that sort is excluded at least for the present.

The bankers, from the international point of view, are concerned only with short-term German debts. The fact that a change in the situation in Germany would be capable of creating serious obstacles to their recovery explains in part the great lowering of certain bank securities. There is reason to expect at the end of the year important amortizations representing losses sustained during the last 12 months. These losses, whatever their origin, discourage the clientele and intensify the feeling of uncertainty accentuated by the news abroad.

The continual lowering of securities of fixed yield causes grave worries to all financial institutions which hold important quantities of bonds, especially railroad bonds. The opinion is strengthening that it is the duty of Congress to occupy itself in the first place with the question of loans to railroads as well as the plan for taxing other means of transportation in order to lessen their competition.

The problem of Treasury loans is likewise becoming urgent. The budgetary deficit is increasing at a rate that indicates an excess of expenses for the fiscal year of about two billion. The Treasury always has recourse to the issuing of short-term bonds; and as the amount of debts due December 15 represents almost one billion, a new operation is announced. The bankers are certain the issues of December will greatly exceed one billion. Their situation permits them to finance these important operations less and less, and many among them insist that the Treasury procure funds directly from the public, offering these loans at increased rates of interest. Bankers also oppose these bonds serving as basis for the rediscount operations of Federal reserve banks. The present vogue of issuing Treasury bonds at a very low rate of interest constitutes an anomaly which can only be upheld by the tacit authorization to use the bonds to obtain credit from the reserve banks. In case the Treasury should be obliged to follow the recommendations of the bankers, the present market prices of Liberty bonds can not be maintained. So far they have resisted the depression and have remained almost intact.

This week will be very busy.

CONGRESS AND THE CRISIS

NEW YORK, December 8.—The message of the President was received with a certain deception. On foreign questions he avoids taking a position, limiting himself to proposing the ratification of the present moratorium; he announces that a special message on the entire foreign policy will follow. Business circles regret the absence of a definite program on this side. The same was said to me by one of the chief bankers of New York, who thinks that this will not facilitate the task of negotiators now in Europe.

More than ever Wall Street is disturbed and alarmed, fearing that, in spite of the latest news from Paris, the short-term obligations will finally have to be consolidated into long-term credits.

The opinion of Congress concerning the necessity of arriving at a settlement of the question of foreign debts, including inter-allied debts and reparations, is taking second place in the presence of the anxiety caused by the domestic situation of the country, which data from all parts indicate as progressively worse. The Members of Congress are very much impressed by the uniformly unfavorable tenor of information received from their constituents. The presidential plan, announced in the message, of creating the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, with a capital of $500,000,000 and authorized to loan one billion five hundred million to reinforce feeble points, produces a good impression; but it is agreed that if it is not quickly realized and skilfully directed this enterprise will come too late. The situation of the railroads continues to inspire special apprehension.

CRITICISM OF THE POLICY OF PRESIDENT HOOVER—EUROPEAN PROBLEMS—WEAKNESS OF THE MARKET

1. The opposition of Congress to the proposals of President Hoover, tending to reestablish the debt commission and put on its feet the new credit corporation, disturbs Wall Street, which fears new difficulties because of the postponement of measures of aid.

2. It is true that public opinion as well as that of Congress judges unfavorably the President's plan to authorize the credit corporation to discount at the reserve banks on the same basis as the funds of the Government various classes of securities up to a sum of $2,000,000,000. Some elements are opposed to any plan of this nature; one would prefer to see the credit corporation given less important resources, but coming from a loan issued to the public.

3. There is no doubt that the measures envisaged for the revision of foreign debts will be finally adopted; but the method proposed by the President which would place the entire question in the hands of a commission, apparently appointed by him, is not well received.

4. The step taken before the Senate committees by Mr. Mills, Under Secretary of the Treasury, to submit to the chief of the two parties a statement authorizing the foreign governments to postpone their payments due the 15th of this month, seems to indicate that events are going to be precipitated. It does not follow, however, that a decision is near, but rather than the struggle is going to begin. One is led to believe that it will be relatively long. If the ratification of the present moratorium is considered certain, one can not foresee what will follow, and the debates may last weeks. The inclination to give England more favorable treatment than France meets a certain opposition, but Mr. Hoover and Mr. Mellon have probably made promises on this matter.

In Wall Street the week has been bad; the bond market is equally heavy; the announcement Monday of the embargo on exports of gold from Japan affected the Japanese funds. Canadian currency and funds have suffered because of the critical position of Canada from the point of view of gold.

THE HOOVER PROJECTS

NEW YORK, December 15.—The presidential plan of reestablishing the debt commission is meeting serious obstacles, and it is predicted on various sides that it can not be adopted. The moratorium is also the subject of prolonged discussions in the committees and corridors, especially in the House, where the Democratic majority shows little sympathy for the wishes of the Executive. However, it is generally believed that the moratorium will be ratified.

Keen criticism is also directed against the Hoover plan for a new credit corporation. It is said the plan would tend toward inflation. Republican Senators are inclined to support it, but many believe that the power of rediscounting the bonds of the corporation at the reserve banks is a danger and refuse to approve it.

The fight is lively. It seems virtually impossible now that the plan can be adopted before the parliamentary recess beginning the 23d. In various parts of the country financial establishments are in an increasingly difficult situation and waiting to ask aid of the corporation.

The National Credit Corporation constituted some time ago by the bankers is almost inactive.

THE STOCK EXCHANGE CRISIS—IN CONGRESS

NEW YORK, December 17.—The new collapse on the part of Wall Street has increased uneasiness and provoked a renewal of demands for the closing of the exchange, which have been produced at each critical moment since the abandonment of the gold standard by Great Britain. The advocates of the maintenance operations reply that no good would come from its closing, particularly this month, which is that of the realization of securities in view of the payment of taxes and other operations at the end of the year. They emphasize, moreover, that the fall of the market price has probably already done all the damage possible.

The serious situation of various kinds of financial establishments, which have large portfolios of securities whose market price is constantly dropping without any really justified motive, comes in large part from the realizations effected by other bearers who procure funds for themselves in a period when the demands of the market are more unusual than they have ever been.

In Congress Mr. Davidson, of the house of Morgan, disclosed to the Committee on Ways and Means, which was discussing the moratorium, that foreign governments indebted to the United States had not deposited the funds to meet the payments of December 15, contrary to certain statements. The committee ended its debates and agreed that the question of the ratification of the moratorium be presented to-day. It is expected that the present moratorium will be ratified by the House before Saturday night. On the other hand, no progress seems to have been made concerning an extension of the moratorium or the reestablishment of the debt commission.

IN WALL STREET

The atmosphere was still improved Saturday. Profit taking after the active advance of the evening before caused a little irregularity, but on closing the rises amounted to more than the falls. Variations in either direction were of slight importance.

Bond market well sustained.

The weekly circular of the principal brokerage houses reflects the improvement in general sentiment.

THE SITUATION OF THE AMERICAN MARKETS

NEW YORK, December 20.—After the active advance of Friday, which was affirmed to-day, the pessimistic predictions and the somber analyses of recent times are no longer much heard. Passing of dividends continues. Financial establishments and to a lesser extent industrial establishments will be obliged at the end of the year to allot large sums for amortizations.

The market is carefully following the debates in Congress, thinking that a rapid vote on the measures envisaged would cause certain financial embarrassments to be avoided, which otherwise would be unavoidable.

There is no longer a question of the possibility of the closing of Wall Street. The president of the stock exchange will not even permit the question to be discussed. The latter is a firm defender of a free and open market under all circumstances, and has not ceased to state this point of view on all occasions, exactly like the syndic of the Paris Bourse, who expressed this opinion to us when I was last in Paris.

THE MOST CRITICAL PERIOD FOR ALL AMERICAN BUSINESS

NEW YORK, December 27.—Financial circles have made use of these three days' vacation to try to appreciate the elements of the situation at their true value. These various aspects form the subject of discussions in New York and Washington, and consequently there is expected a vigorous action in favor of measures of aid when Congress reconvenes. Numerous industrial and financial enterprises who have doubts about the future are postponing important decisions concerning their program of activity until it is certain what the Government can do to help enterprises which are threatened with difficulties. The beginning of the year is going to be the most critical period for all American business.

The discussions by Congress may delay the realization of projects envisaged, and in that case the enterprises which find no more help on the money market and count absolutely upon the immediate aid of the Government will be reduced to the deposit of their balance.

The short-term commitments which mature early in 1932 are very heavy and a number of them can not be honored with State aid.

Wall Street is very disappointed at the vote of Congress on the moratorium and the various reservations introduced in the terms of the final resolution of approval. It is thought the position adopted is apparently a recall from that of last summer.

As concerns the railroads, better conditions for long-term bonds will be made possible by the present projects for raising the rates which are on the point of becoming effective and by the concessions on the part of the personnel on the question of salaries. Nevertheless, some extremists continue to state that the Government may be obliged to retake the systems and assume their financial responsibilities, even if it does not exploit them itself.

The increase in activity in the iron and steel industry and in the automobile industry appears to be continuing, and orders are somewhat better for the beginning of the new year.

The manufacturing activity and the sales of the products are quite satisfactory in certain branches, but, on the whole, uncertainty persists.

The fundamental problem is to end banking failures. The new "corporation" which the Government is going to create will try to improve the lot of small establishments.

In Wall Street the renewal of transactions Monday will probably show the natural indecision after three days of closing, accentuated by the lack of initiative and the absence of any program by business men and financiers. Sales at a loss in view of the establishment of the taxes will continue.

THE RÔLE OF THE RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION—IMPROVEMENT IN THE GENERAL SITUATION—APPREHENSIONS ON THE SUBJECT OF COUNTRY BANKS—THE VARIOUS INFLATION TENDENCIES

NEW YORK, January 6.—1. The report of the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency, charged to examine the project of creating the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, has just been published. It indicates that all the witnesses heard by the committee and all persons, political and otherwise, which it questioned were unanimous in demanding a vote on the bill deposed by the Government. The amendments adopted by the committee tend to modify the provisions relative to the issuing of the bonds for the purpose of rendering them unacceptable for discount by the Federal reserve banks. The Government will try in the course of the debate in the Senate to make its point of view prevail, but there are more chances now that the amendment will stand so that the bonds of the Finance Corporation will depend on their own virtue to find takers. The Treasury will have the right to buy and sell them to preserve their market value, which, in the opinion of the directors of finance, should facilitate their placement. There is the explanation for the rise in railroad securities Wednesday. The market thinks that the new corporation will certainly furnish all the funds necessary to redeem the railroad bonds maturing in the winter or spring; the railroads will thus have time to right themselves.

2. The general situation is improving.

3. On the contrary, the discouraging factor resides in the precarious position of the country banks. It will fall upon the new corporation to facilitate the reopening of banks which have closed their doors. The problem of righting the banking situation in the United States remains most difficult. It is possible that the Government may be obliged to ask Congress for several hundreds of millions to aid the depositors of the banks that have failed. Otherwise the distress will continue for a long time and become worse, because many people are entirely without resources.

4. Inflationist ideas are coming to light to such an extent that a number of absurd projects for the issuing of new notes as legal tender are being proposed. The Government operations themselves bear the danger of inflation. This danger can only be removed if the new corporation succeeds in placing its bonds among the public without recourse to the resources of the banks.

THE NEW ANTIDEFLATION POLICY OF THE FEDERAL RESERVE BANKS

1. According to the official report, Governor Harrison of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York made the following statement on January 8 to the conference of the New York Bankers Association:

2. We have at our disposal the mechanism for stopping deflation and to gradually erect a structure of healthy values and solid business. What we need is to slaken the reins, to drive away the fear which is paralyzing the world. We must establish confidence in ourselves and the courage to go forward.

3. The reserve banks are in a position to increase by $3,500,000,000 their credit to members of the system, which would mathematically form the basis of an increase of $35,000,000,000 of banking credit.

4. There are more than $8,000,000,000 of "eligible" assets in the banks affiliated with the system. In banks which do not have "eligible" paper, or for banks not affiliated with the system, it will be the Reconstruction Finance Corporation which must constitute a particularly powerful support. With the supplementary help of the National Credit Corporation, it seems reasonable to predict that every healthy bank will be able to procure resources which are necessary as soon as the demand for an increase in credit is manifest.

5. The total volume of banking credits has diminished in two years by more than $6,500,000,000. That is perhaps the chief reason for the rapid reduction in bank deposits. One thing is certain; the deflation of credit must end if we hope to help in a speedy revival. The Federal reserve banks can not stop it by themselves alone, nor can the public. But the efforts of all combined can do it and must. It is a question of confidence in ourselves and of reciprocal confidence.

6. In reply to a cable, we received the following from New York:

7. The general policy of ease and expansion of credit, decided upon by the Federal reserve system a week ago, has been the subject of commentaries in the American press for several days.

8. The Journal of Commerce of New York in an article published January 13, said: "The Federal Reserve Bank of New York has inaugurated a new effort to stimulate expansion of credit," etc.

9. The New York Times published an article under the title, "The Reserve Bank Acts to Arrest Deflation."

10. It is understood that these articles were inspired and, after their publication, approved by the directors of the reserve system. Other articles along the same line appeared in numerous papers.

11. In previous cables I have limited myself to calling attention to the request of the President in his various statements, including messages to Congress, for easing the restrictions governing the régime of advances made by the reserve banks so as to enlarge the bases of credit. That means the adoption of projects destined to facilitate discount and permitting the admission to the reserve banks of paper unacceptable up to the present. One of these projects, originally supported by Senator VANDENBERG and apparently approved in high places, would permit the admission of promissory notes of banks affiliated to the system, guaranteed collaterally by industrial and railroad bonds.

12. These inflationist ideas continue to be the object of discussions and have many advocates.

13. I have never mentioned any provision which would tend to inflate the public debt; nevertheless, the intention exists, as the authorities admit, of proceeding to important operations of issue to meet obligations due next June, so much the more since the new taxes can not be created and collected in time. Loans on a vast scale are also inevitable, the budgetary deficit being more than two billion. All the new obligations, according to the present régime, are "eligible" as collateral guarantee for discount by the reserve banks. If the authorities of the reserve bank commence the campaign for easy money, as has been announced, it is inevitable that the issue of new obligations will tend strongly to increase the volume of credits of the reserve banks pledged on these securities.

NEW YORK, January 10.—Great purchases of German bonds were carried out in the last stock exchanges, and especially Friday, on the announcement, professing to be from a source of the first order, of a definitive Franco-German agreement on the subject of the prorogation of the reparations moratorium for three years. According to these rumors, put in circulation in a private way, the Lausanne conference would give no definitive result, but afterwards, when the political situation in France became clearer, a statement would be made in the sense indicated above. It is evident that this point of view may be modified because of the position taken Saturday by Mr. Brüning, considered here a rude maneuver, right in the German manner, to facilitate further bargaining.

The step taken by the mayor of New York, through the Senators of New York State, showed the grave situation in which various municipalities find themselves from the point of view of the financing of their immediate needs. In his memorandum the mayor demands an enlargement of the statutes of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation in order that cities may contract loans from the Federal Government. The fact that Chicago, Philadelphia, and several other cities have suspended payments on a number of municipal obligations, the market price of which has been considerably lowered, gives an idea of the extent of the depression and its consequences for the finances of the towns and States.

New acceptances by the railroad workers of a reduction of 10 per cent in salary indicate that the conference of the general directors of the systems and the representatives of the workers, which will take place next Thursday, will result in an agreement on the basis of the proposals of the railroads.

The industrial companies are beginning to publish the results of 1931. According to the preliminary figures just announced, the profits of General Electric would not exceed $1.35 per share (against $1.90 for 1930). The company would be obliged to appropriate large sums for the amortization of losses on participation in foreign enterprises. These amortizations will appear in the balance at the end of the year. Various companies, and especially the banks, are in the same situation. Rumor says—and it comes from a very good source—that the New York banks would soon agree to a general reduction of dividends.

A better atmosphere prevails in certain branches of industry and commerce, but disquiet on the subject of the weak financial condition of enterprises and the desire to be reassured on this point by the definitive constitution of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation tend to counteract the effect of the improvement in general perspectives.

As concerns the siderurgical industry the announcement of the diminution of about 200,000 tons of orders on the books of United States Steel for December has had a discouraging effect on those who expected a more favorable evolution in the production of steel, the activity of the factories having been recently increased.

The investigation of foreign issues is being continued, but the financial world is interested in it less and less. The investigation is now considered an element of propaganda against foreign countries in general, carried out for political ends, and it would not have occurred if any practical effects had been expected.

THE INFLATIONIST POLICY

NEW YORK, January 13.—1. Inflation is the order of the day. The Federal reserve banks as well as the legislative assemblies seem to wish to enter upon this path. The lowering of the discount rate will probably be decided upon at the next meeting of the council of the reserve bank of New York. The reduction in rate of purchase of acceptances on the free market, which took place Tuesday, is a preparatory measure to which the reserve bank always has recourse in this case. The financial world considers it an index of a change in the monetary policy and expects large purchases of Government funds, acceptances, and perhaps other securities for the purpose of increasing the available funds of the market and definitely easing the general situation. The efforts to create easy money are accompanied by proposals tending to enlarge the basis of credit at the Federal reserve banks. President Hoover made them in his message of January 4, and since then has asked Congress for various measures in this sense.

2. All attempts to restrain inflation and prevent expansion of credit, which would have as basis long-term engagements, will meet general opposition. The inflationist ideas are solidly in possession of a number of minds in financial circles and their care is rather to succeed in putting these ideas into practice, at least in part, rather than to limit their development. Wall Street is generally favorable to the proposed legislative measures and greets inflation as assuring a rise in values.

3. Some financiers are frightened by the apparent inauguration of a new era of squandering and presage possibilities of dangerous consequences. They do not believe that the good effects from an era of expansion of credit can be expected to last long and think that good results should be obtained rather by the systematic application of other remedies, concerning especially foreign commerce, Government finances, and taxes. The greatest danger resides in the risks to which the Federal reserve banks are exposed in regard to the various plans for the extension of their operations of discount and loans. The reserve banks themselves some time ago pronounced themselves against any modification of the régime of discount and against any enlargements of the bases of credit which they are now authorized to grant. They have the appearance now of having changed their opinion. Some insist even on the necessity of easing the regulations now in effect.

4. Certain observers note that the departure of gold, stopped some time ago, may recommence.

THE NEW INFLATION POLICY

NEW YORK, January 17.—1. The situation of the market as a whole is improving, in spite of fluctuations and recoils. Qualified observers incline more and more to believe that the liquidations are almost ended, and that henceforth every effective revival in commerce and industry will bring about an advance of securities. Conservative circles are, however, convinced that inflation alone will not suffice to attain this end, but a vigorous impulse has been given in this direction, especially considering the presidential campaign. The keen desire of the politicians is evidently to create a semblance of return to prosperity before the formal designation of candidates, which will occur in the middle of the year.

2. The fact that the Federal reserve system is participating in a program of inflation is considered by certain authorities as a violation of the entente which was made public at the time of the visit of Laval and even before. This new policy is likewise contrary to the teachings of experience. Some still hope that the projects for inflation will be retained but the great desire of Government authorities to create a market favorable to the issuing of bonds is opposed to the maintenance of a deflation policy. Present needs for very great issues of bonds require the return of easy money. The Secretary of the Treasury this week informed the Committee on Ways and Means that a great deficit must be expected in June, amounting to about two thousand one hundred and fifty million, which must be covered for the most part by issues of bonds. Opposition to increased taxes is evident on all sides. Such measures are necessary but will not produce results for some time.

3. The rumor current here that the Bank of France is recalling its credits from abroad is received without surprise. The opinion was recently expressed in banking circles that nothing should be done to encourage the maintenance here of deposits of foreign gold nor to attract new ones and that the condition of the country would be more solid without them.

4. The adoption by the House of the plan for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation presages a near agreement between the two assemblies on the final form of the bill, but there are several points still to be discussed.

5. In spite of all that one says of inflation, the table of effective deposits in the 44 principal banks, having each at least $100,000,000 in deposits, shows for last year a total diminution of two billion six hundred million, which brought them to fourteen billion two hundred and eighty-five million. Nevertheless, this number is much higher than that of 1926.

6. Conversions which marked Wall Street on Saturday are apparently mere takings of profit.

7. It seems that speculation properly so-called has not yet decided to interfere in the upward movement. The new rise in price should therefore be the result of real purchases, including those made by European capitalists. These latter seem to have been very active lately, believing that the situation of the United States is more favorable.

CONCERNING INFLATION OF CREDIT—THE HESITATION OF THE FEDERAL RESERVE SYSTEM

NEW YORK, January 18.—1. The information concerning the new policy of the Federal reserve system and the plans for pushing the program of inflation on a vast scale is widely spread throughout the country and the serious press generally sanctions it.

2. However, the repercussion of these projects on the French and English markets, as well as on numerous large capitalists in the United States itself, has provoked hesitation. According to information obtained to-day the directors of the Federal reserve system are inclined at present to take into account, in the orientation of their policy, the effect it will produce on European markets.

In any case there can be no doubt of the nature of the plan originally established.

THE ANTIDEFLATIONIST MEASURES AND THEIR CONSEQUENCES

NEW YORK, January 20.—1. The problem of inflation continues to be keenly debated in financial and political circles. The number of bankers who take a strong position against inflation is steadily increasing. There is manifest a pressure on the Federal reserve system to abandon the policy, widely announced last week, tending to resort again to the application of lowered monetary rates and important purchases on the open market. Conservative opinion remains opposed to it.

2. The financial world is in general well satisfied with the nomination of General Dawes as head of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. It is believed that he has financial experience, and his previous career as a banker will induce him to put his influence on the side of prudence, which advises not to enter except circumspectly in the way of expansion of credit. The nomination of the other administrators is awaited with impatience. Unless there is among them a number of opponents of inflation sufficient to overcome the inflationist interests the danger might be grave.

3. The opinion is gaining ground that if one wishes to obtain real results the available funds which the new loans are destined to bring to the Government must be obtained as soon as possible by a direct appeal to the public, who at present are hoarding cash to a large extent or are keeping their funds inactive in banks.

4. It is now generally forecast that the Bank of France will recall from here its earmarked gold and will likewise retire a part of its credits in dollars. This conforms to what I have already cabled you; the fact is known and published by various papers, even by certain ones which were previously inclined to deny it. Qualified representatives of the financial world continue to consider the repatriation of gold as the best policy. In their opinion, the influence of the European markets, which have shown uneasiness on the subject of the projects of expression of credit, has been beneficial. I believe that the Farnier-Lacour-Gayet-Federal reserve agreement was concluded for three months. If this limit is correct, it must expire soon, but the problems which confront the banking authorities are the same as last autumn. Also, a vigorous opposition against the expansion of credit exercises at this time an exceptional influence on American opinion.

5. The representatives of the two legislative assemblies came to an agreement this evening on the definitive text of the bill relative to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. The bonds of the corporation may not be discounted or sold by the reserve banks, but the Treasury is authorized to issue bonds to support the bonds of the corporation on the market, and these Treasury bonds are eligible for purchase as well as discount.

6. The cables received up to to-day from European sources indicating that the Lausanne conference will probably only assemble experts to arrange the postponement of the question of the moratorium are in accord with American predictions.

UNCERTAINTY AT WASHINGTON AND IN WALL STREET

NEW YORK, January 24.—All business is now in suspense awaiting events and especially the result of the negotiations in Chicago between the representatives of the railroad employees and those of the railroad companies. The market fears that this result will not be satisfactory, even if the directors of the systems are successful on certain points. The sole entirely satisfactory result would be the acceptance in block of the proposals of the companies.

The definitive adoption of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is received with less enthusiasm than was predicted; apparently the market wishes to know first how the enterprise will be organized. Everything depends on the directors. It is admitted in Washington that the principal authority will probably be in the hands of General Dawes, but it will be limited by the general directives established by the council of administration. The market is impatient to have some indications of the financial policy of the council.

The movement of exportation of gold continues and it seems that it must last for some time. All the information which I have received concerning this question is confirmed by facts. The Bank of France is gradually recalling its credits, taking them in a way to disturb our markets as little as possible. The attempts to make it be believed that the shipments of gold represent only the withdrawal of earmarked gold has not had any results, the daily figures of shipments of gold greatly exceeding the diminution of earmarked gold.

The repercussions of European opinion on the policy of the inflation of credit are gaining in strength and if they develop may determine the modifications in the banking measures which otherwise would have been applied. My warning cables may have helped to warn European bankers in time. The Wall Street circles and qualified bankers are now inclined to consider the entire question with more care than before.

It is probable that the market is going to remain in expectation, awaiting the definitive turn taken by the question of inflation and by those of the banking policy and the railroad régime. Wall Street seems to be at the point where its capacity for resistance may be again put to the test.

WHY WALL STREET REMAINS DEPRESSED, FEBRUARY 7

1. Wall Street ended the week on a heavy note, without trace of improvement. Optimistic data are rare, and the bears spread the impression that the near turn of events will be unfavorable to the market. Business men are disappointed, although the organization for help, which was the object of general hope at the beginning of the winter, was put on its feet under the conditions provided. The news that certain large railroads have asked help from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation was a disagreeable surprise, for it was thought that enterprises of wide expanse would refrain and leave the funds at the disposal of weaker companies.

2. The opinion is growing that a radical change of orientation of the policy of the United States, especially as concerns the commercial relations with foreign countries and foreign loans, is indispensable in order to prepare a real return to prosperity. The public is beginning to wish to see clearly into these problems and to know the exact attitude of the parties on these questions in view of the coming electoral campaign.

The appeal of President Hoover against hoarding is criticized by his political opponents, who think that the true way to end hoarding is to restore confidence, adopting healthy methods and economic principles.

The possibility of differences with Japan is received calmly and without particular uneasiness, but a large part of the press expresses its discontent with the way our policy has been conducted in the Far East up to the present. The market continues to attach very little importance to the Sino-Japanese conflict.

The attention of Wall Street is concentrated entirely on the development of difficulties in business; it is the prospects of essential industries which weigh on the exchange, so much the more since it is still impossible to figure exactly in what measure these new organizations of financial aid will bring relief, and especially as concerns the situation of the banks. The new diminution of advances to brokers shows that the public is not interested in the market. The sales of securities on behalf of banks are less pressing.

THE NEW BANKING AND MONETARY POLICY

NEW YORK, February 14.—The great animation which characterized the market Saturday and the strong advances in certain securities reflect the approval by Wall Street of the policy of extension of credit. The attention of financial circles is for the moment concentrated principally on the two clauses of the new bill; the one which admits the State funds as cover for the Federal reserve notes, at the pleasure of the reserve banks, in view of the liberation of gold; the other which authorizes these latter to discount the drafts of affiliated banks pledged on all sorts of guaranties which may be thought acceptable, without any account being taken of the restrictions up to now imposed by the Federal reserve act.

The opinion on the financial market is divided. The speculative interests, in general, approve the project, as it was conceived with a view to inflation. Certain brokers express themselves the same in their circulars to the clientele. Other houses are much disturbed, and express the fear in their weekly letters that the new measures will not increase the demands for gold within the United States as well as for accounts abroad.

The press is no longer in agreement. Certain papers speak against the new plan, which they consider too hazardous; others say that it will check the depression and encourage the liberation of credits. Finally, those who believe that when the banks of issue proceed to an extension of credit, there can be expected a rise in prime materials, count upon this latter result.

Up to now there are no serious indications which permit a pronouncement in either sense. Conservative opinion thinks that the reserve banks and the Government are called upon to play the decisive rôle in the question; it is therefore only an affair of administration and direction.

The problem remains this: Is the new policy of expansion healthy? Washington and Wall Street are especially interested in the attitude of Europe toward this new situation and the interpretations of the new law beyond the Atlantic.

The conditions of industry and commerce are not improved. Banks tend to limit or refuse credit to numerous borrowers, being anxious to maintain the liquidity of their resources.

RELIEF OF AGRICULTURE

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I do not propose to detain the Senate long, but I do want to call attention to a report sent out by the Associated Press respecting a hearing which is in progress at Chicago. I quote:

TELLS DROUGHT EFFECT IN RAIL-RATE ATTACK—GOVERNOR RELATES CONDITIONS IN NORTH DAKOTA AT CHICAGO HEARING

CHICAGO, ILL., May 2.—The first evidence of agriculture's plight was presented the Interstate Commerce Commission to-day by Gov. George Shafer, of North Dakota. This opened the grain growers' attack on the rate increases asked by the western railroads.

Declaring he was not seeking special privilege for agriculture as against the carriers, Governor Shafer said he was advocating the growers' cause in the rate hearing "in the interests of economic justice."

Conditions in the northwestern counties of North Dakota, the governor said, have reached the proportions of disaster. Some 9,000 families, or 45,000 men, women, and children, in the 15 counties of this area, have lived on relief during the winter.

CITES DROUGHT PRODUCTION

Governor Shafer outlined the wheat production of his State: In 1928, 155,000,000 bushels; 99,000,000 bushels in 1929; 108,000,000 bushels in 1930; and 32,000,000 in 1931—this last the worst drought year in North Dakota's history. Too, weather conditions in 1929 and 1930 were unfavorable for an average good yield.

Benjamin Larkin, president of the North Dakota Board of Railway Commissioners, said this testimony was designed to show that bad crops were responsible for the grain-revenue declines of carriers; that what was needed was a good crop and not increased revenue.

"Why should the growers," Larkin asked, "be penalized by higher rates on something over which they had no control?"

RAIL LAWYER PROTESTS

Examiner Arthur Mackley asked Governor Shafer if he believed that inasmuch as the carriers have lost traffic to competition in other commodities, the rates should be hiked on what traffic the carriers still had, such as grain and grain products.

A. B. Enoch, chairman of the carriers' legal counsel, who previously had said the railroads would enter no objection to Governor Shafer's presentation of evidence on the growers' economic distress, jumped up in protest of this question. He contended that inasmuch as the governor said he was not qualified to discuss rates, this question was improper.

The examiner withdrew the question.

Mr. President, notwithstanding the deplorable situation of agriculture, and despite the fact that last month both wheat and corn were less than one-half the price of these cereals, as an average during the month of April, from 1909 to 1914, the railroads are contending for an increase, compared with the rates of that period, up to 44 per cent per bushel in the case of wheat and 46 per cent per bushel in the case of corn, from such a point in the wheat-and-corn region of the Middle West as Grand Island, Nebr., situated near the center of the State.

I call attention to the following table:

Freight rates on wheat and corn from Grand Island, Nebr., to Chicago, from 1914 to February 20, 1932, as reported by Interstate Commerce Commission

Year	Wheat		Rate index numbers	Corn		Rate index numbers
	100 pounds	Bushel		100 pounds	Bushel

Freight rates on wheat and corn from Grand Island, Nebr., to Chicago, from 1914 to February 20, 1932, as reported by Interstate Commerce Commission—Continued

Year	Wheat		Rate index numbers	Corn		Rate index numbers

May 20, 1920	31.5	18.9	123	31.5	18.9	137
Aug. 25, 1920	42.5	25.5	166	42.5	25.5	185
Nov. 22, 1920	43.0	25.8	168	43.0	25.8	187
Jan. 2, 1922	37.5	22.5	146	34.0	20.4	148
June 1, 1922	37.0	22.2	144	33.5	20.1	146
Aug. 1, 1931	28.0	16.8	109.3	28.0	16.8	122
Feb. 20, 1932	37.0	22.2	144	33.5	20.1	146
Proposed 10 per cent increase on wheat	40.7	24.4	158.4
Proposed 20 per cent increase on corn				40.2	24.12	175.2

What does this all mean? It means that in the pre-war period referred to it was necessary for a farmer in that section of Nebraska to pay the railroads 15.4 cents to get a bushel of wheat to the Chicago market. His net return for that bushel of wheat was about 90 cents.

How much wheat was it necessary for the farmer to ship to Chicago last month to net 90 cents? Not 1 bushel, but 2 bushels. Therefore, to net the farmer last month in Grand Island 90 cents from the sale of wheat it was necessary for him to pay the railroads not 15.4 cents but 44.4 cents.

In the case of corn, during April of the pre-war period the farmer received, as an average, 49 cents as a net return from shipping a bushel of corn to the Chicago market. For the transportation service on this corn the farmer was compelled to pay at that time 13¾ cents per bushel. But last month, that the farmer might net 49 cents from the sale of corn in Chicago, it was necessary for him to pay the railroads not 13¾ cents but 40.2 cents.

Notwithstanding these facts, Mr. President, the railroads are contending for an increase of 10 per cent in the present freight rate in the case of wheat and 20 per cent in the case of corn.

Why is this? It is because the strong arm of the Government is extended to protect the railroads, though they are monopolies. The rates are fixed; they are fixed by decree of Congress. But what about agriculture? Congress has failed to do anything to give a corresponding protection to agriculture; and what is the consequence? To net the farmer 90 cents, shipping wheat from Grand Island to the Chicago market, whereas he paid the railroad 15.4 cents in the period 1909–1914, he must now supply twice the wheat and pay the railroads nearly three times 15.4 cents to net 90 cents. Yet we in Congress have no time for the farmer. This is the fourth bank bill that has been considered at this session of Congress. The moratorium was nothing but a bankers' bill. Then we had the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill; then the Glass-Steagall bill; and now we have the pending Glass bill under consideration.

Mr. President, it is time we took occasion to think about the farmer and the debtor, not the creditor wholly. There are two classes in this country, generally speaking, creditors and debtors. We have been thinking altogether too much about the creditor. What we ought to do is to give some time and attention to the debtor.

Mr. President, are we to do anything for agriculture? Are we to continue through the remaining portion of the session—and only 30 days are left—without acting for agriculture? There is not a bill pending on the calendar of the House for a constructive measure on behalf of agriculture. There is not a bill pending on the calendar of the Senate of a constructive nature for agriculture.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, until the purchasing power of the farmer is restored, can we hope for permanent prosperity?

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, the farmers and the other ruralists of this country constitute 44 per cent of our population. The economic fortunes of the ruralists other than the farmer follow that of the farmer's. The farmer's buying power has been decreased one-half, and that means that 44 per cent of our population have but one-half of the purchasing power they formerly had, and until we restore that purchasing power we will not recover from this depression. The whole country is vitally interested. That ought to have been apparent to Congress years ago.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, was it not pointed out a number of times by the friends of agriculture, and by the supporters of bills to aid agriculture, that if the purchasing power of the farmer should be permitted to continue in its decline the collapse which we have witnessed was inevitable?

Mr. HOWELL. Congress has had ample warning of what might occur, but we have been thinking about commerce and the mechanical industries rather than about the agricultural industry. I want to emphasize again, we have been giving most of our thought to the creditor and little to the debtor, and the debtor in this country is obligated to-day, taking into account public and private debts, to the extent of $203,000,000,000. With the purchasing power of the debtor where it is to-day, $203,000,000,000 is not the real measure of our indebtedness. It is vastly more.

Mr. President, I urge again that we do something for the farmer before we adjourn. If we do not, what are we going to say to the farmer when we return home?

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HOWELL. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. I notice the Senator has had a very distinguished convert to his views. I observe that Mr. Owen D. Young yesterday came out for the equalization fee.

Mr. HOWELL. I am not at all surprised that a man who is so familiar with business and with economics as is Mr. Owen D. Young should finally conclude that the equalization-fee plan, which was twice passed by Congress, has in it such merit as to justify the enactment of such a measure for the rescue of agriculture. This we must do before we leave Washington in June.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, if two Presidents of the United States had taken the same view of the economic soundness of the equalization fee, we might have had that law in operation, and this calamity would have been averted. I was delighted to see Mr. Young take that view, because, as the Senator knows, I personally have always supported the equalization fee, and have believed it was economically sound, and was the only way, in my vision, which made possible revival of agricultural prosperity. I sincerely hope the Senator will succeed in getting a favorable recommendation upon his bill, in order that the spirit of the Senate may be tested, to see whether or not there is here a genuine interest on behalf of the farmer.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, it is a fact that I have introduced a bill, which I think would at least prove a consolation prize to the farmer. Yet I have an open mind. What I want to see done is something of a constructive character, and I am not insisting upon my plan. I do not merely want to see something done of such character, but I also want something done that will aid industry generally. Therefore upon several occasions I have raised my voice in behalf of the Goldsborough bill, a measure which has the approval of the leading economists of this country. I have not been pleading merely for agriculture alone but for the Nation at large. All must rise from this depression together.

EASEMENT FOR RAILROAD RIGHT OF WAY, POTTER COUNTY, TEX.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Calendar No. 677, the bill (S. 4576) to authorize the Secretary of Commerce to grant an easement for a railroad right of way over and upon a portion of the helium gas bearing lands of the United States of America, in Potter County, in the State of Texas. The easement involves about 14 acres, for which the company is to pay the amount recommended by the Department of Commerce. The bill is approved by the entire committee and ought to pass immediately if it is to become law at this session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, while I generally oppose the practice of taking up matters on the calendar outside of the regular calendar hour, I have examined the bill in question and see the emergency, and therefore have no objection.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I thank the Senator.

There being no objection, the bill was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of Commerce be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to grant and convey to North Plains & Santa Fe Railway Co., a railroad corporation organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the State of Texas, its successors and assigns, an easement for railroad purposes over and upon the following-described property, being a part of certain helium gas bearing lands heretofore acquired by the United States of America, to wit: A strip of land 400 feet wide lying 200 feet each side of the center line of the main track of the North Plains & Sante Fe Railway Co. as said main track is now located and constructed over that part of survey No. 35, G. & M. survey block No. 5, conveyed to the United States of America by deed recorded on the 19th day of September, 1931, in volume 227, pages 221 and the following, of the deed records of Potter County, State of Texas, said strip of land containing an area of 13.88 acres, more or less.

SEC. 2. That the grantee shall pay the Government of the United States of America $13.87 per acre for the acreage contained in the right of way hereinbefore described.

SEC. 3. That the grantee, in further consideration for said easement, shall construct fences on each side of the right of way and maintain them in good condition.

SEC. 4. That the grant herein made shall be subject to the rights excepted and reserved to the Humble Oil & Refining Co. by the provisions of that certain warranty deed dated March 6, 1931, executed by said Humble Oil & Refining Co. to the United States of America, recorded September 19, 1931, in volume 227, pages 221 and the following, of the deed records of Potter County, Tex., and that certain working agreement between the Humble Oil & Refining Co. and the United States of America dated March 6, 1931, recorded September 19, 1931, in volume 224, pages 299 and the following, of said deed records.

SEC. 5. That the United States of America, its successors and assigns, shall have the unrestricted and unimpeded right to lay, maintain, inspect, and remove pipe lines for the transportation of oil, gas, and water, and lines for power and telephone, across said right of way at any and all times, and shall have the right to drill and operate oil and gas wells on said right of way at any location selected by the United States of America, its successors and assigns, except that while railroad tracks are actually in use thereon no well shall be drilled so close as to interfere with the operation of trains across said tracks; also that the grantee shall not unduly and unnecessarily interfere with the United States of America, its successors and assigns, in its use of said right of way.

RECESS

Mr. McNARY. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate (at 5 o'clock p. m.) took a recess until to-morrow, Thursday, May 12, 1932, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, MAY 11, 1932

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Again, Blessed Lord, Thou hast not forgotten to be good and merciful unto us, hence we are prompted to repentance and faith; forgive our sins and help us along in hope and effort. In the performance of all our duties keep us free from misconceptions and misdirections; guard us against mistaken methods and ends. By Thy most holy Word and by the promises of the World's Redeemer let there be inspired in us high character and heroic service. Thou dost unerringly recognize the great soul in the smallest act, and in time Thou wilt crown it beyond the most glowing dream. Our Heavenly Father, we thank Thee. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CORRECT THE SPELLING OF THE NAME OF THE ISLAND OF PORTO RICO

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday, and the Clerk will call the committees.

The Clerk called the committees; and when the Committee on Insular Affairs was called,

Mr. WILLIAMS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Joint Resolution 149, to correct the spelling of the name of the island of Porto Rico.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas calls up a resolution, of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read the title, as follows:

House Joint Resolution 149, to correct the spelling of the name of the island of Porto Rico.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House Joint Resolution 149.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. BROWNING in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the joint resolution.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the joint resolution be dispensed with.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. This is an important joint resolution, Mr. Chairman, and I object.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Whereas in accordance with all historical data relative to the discovery and colonization of the island known as "Porto Rico" the original name given thereto by its discoverer, and consecrated in the royal orders of the colonizing nation, was Isla de San Juan; and

Whereas the first city found on Porto Rican soil, and denominated Villa de Caparra, was given the name of Ciudad de Puertorrico; and

Whereas subsequently, and by virtue of the transfer of the old Ciudad de Puertorrico to the site now occupied by the capital city, the aforesaid names of San Juan and Puertorrico became the exclusive patrimony of such city and island, respectively; and

Whereas the history and traditions of the people have since then sustained and consecrated the name of Puerto Rico, given to such island, as its sole name; and

Whereas immediately following the change of sovereignty which took place in the island, the Congress, without justifying reasons, gave the island the name of "Porto Rico"; and

Whereas the aforesaid name of "Porto Rico" is an impure idiomatic compound partly formed of the word "porto," which, although of Latin origin, has not yet been adopted into the language of the island, but is here used illegitimately as a substitute for the word "puerto," genuinely Spanish, although no license, reasons of diction, or advantages of euphony exist to warrant such substitution; and

Whereas there are no reasons either in the history, the language, or the traditions of the people of the island which support the use of the term "porto" as a part of the name of the island: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That from and after the passage of this resolution the island designated "Porto Rico" in the act entitled "An act to provide a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1917, as amended, shall be known and designated as "Puerto Rico." All laws, regulations, and public documents and records of the United States in which such island is designated or referred to under the name of "Porto Rico" shall be held to refer to such island under and by the name of "Puerto Rico."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Texas does not wish to proceed, I ask for recognition.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman opposed to the joint resolution?

Mr. STAFFORD. I am.

The CHAIRMAN. Is any member of the committee opposed to the joint resolution? If not, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Wisconsin for one hour.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM].

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and include therein a few parallel paragraphs from an address delivered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN], delivered in debate on the independent offices appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, when the independent offices appropriation bill was before the House for consideration, Members will recall that there was quite an interesting little scrap over the item of some $880,000 for the Federal Farm Board. My colleague, the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN], himself a member of the Appropriations Committee, led the fight in an effort to put back into the appropriation bill $880,000 for the Farm Board which had been taken out.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I think the gentleman's colleague is not here, but the amount was $380,000, instead of $880,000.

Mr. WOODRUM. The gentleman from Washington is correct. When the gentleman from Texas addressed the committee on the 8th of April, apparently he was laboring under a good deal of excitement, and he made some remarks about the chairman of the subcommittee that did not sound exactly right, but under the heat and stress of battle, I thought my distinguished friend would have the good taste and tact to take those offensive remarks out of his speech if and when he put the speech in the RECORD.

When he put that speech in the RECORD, this is what he said:

Now, gentlemen, I want to call your attention to a few comments which my colleague, Mr. WOODRUM, made in his address. You know, I was never more surprised in my life than I was in my colleague, Mr. WOODRUM. Judging from his ministerial face and affidavit voice, I was surprised at the violent language used by him and his misrepresentations of the facts.

Of course, I do not care anything about what my friend said in the heat of battle, but I was disappointed that he thought about it for a month and then put it into the RECORD. The gentleman goes on to say that sooner than take the position that I took in fighting the Farm Board's appropriation on that occasion, he would retire from Congress. Of course, we would hate to see the gentleman do that, but I always regret to see a Member take the floor in debate, or take any position, in which he undertakes to make slurring remarks about his colleagues and at the same time holds himself up as the acme of perfection and intellectual honesty and integrity. I do not know about my ministerial face or my affidavit voice, but I did try as best I could on that occasion to lead my erring friend back into the paths of legislative righteousness, though to no avail. However, the House, in its good judgment, vindicated my position. I was fighting on the floor of this House for economy and the attitude of the cooperative associations, the Grain Stabilization Corporation and the American Cotton Cooperative Association, in racketeering—and I repeat the term I used then—at the expense of the American farmer, by paying outrageous salaries to their employees. I showed in my remarks on April 6 that 10 employees of these organizations average $34,000 each as salaries. I do not know whether they were taking it out of the Treasury of the United States, or taking it out of the pockets of the farmers, but wherever it comes from, I said then and I say now, it is unconscionable, and Congress ought to correct it.

But, Mr. Chairman, when my friend charges me with misrepresenting facts, he makes a rather serious charge. And while we are speaking of misrepresentations, I know the House and the country will be interested to have the distinguished gentleman explain, if he can explain, how it happens that his speech is in portions practically verbatim, column for column, word for word, with the speech that was put into the RECORD by the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA], who also addressed the committee when it was considering this bill on the 8th of April. The integrity of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is a matter that should receive the careful consideration of this Congress, and while there are certain latitudes that Members have a right to indulge in in revising and extending remarks made upon the floor, I have never understood that a man had the right to deliberately appropriate the language of another and insert it in the RECORD as his own speech, without giving credit to whomever was the author of the language. Yet we find that remarkable situation. I have here two speeches, set paragraph to paragraph, in parallel columns, which I shall insert in the RECORD under leave heretofore granted. Mark you, both of these speeches are supposed to have been delivered on the 8th of April by these two gentlemen. This document I hold in my hand is not the entire speech of either gentleman, but I have deleted from their speeches those sentences and paragraphs which are identical and which show upon their face beyond any possible controversy that they are identical language and that they came from the pen of the same author. Mark also the fact that they are not put in as quotations, but put in as the language of the gentlemen and supposed to have been delivered on the floor on the same day. I find the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] saying (p. 7796):

This country is committed, by the passage of the agricultural marketing act, to the policy of Government aid to cooperating marketing associations owned, controlled, and managed by farmers. That was three years ago. The action of this subcommittee reverses the policy of Congress, nullifies the agricultural marketing act, and brings joy and gladness of heart to every cotton and grain gambler in New York, Chicago, Dallas, New Orleans, and elsewhere.

Then I find the gentleman from Texas saying (p. 7781):

Congress committed this country, by the passage of the agricultural marketing act, to the policy of Government aid to cooperative marketing associations, owned, controlled, and managed by farmers. That was three years ago. The action of this subcommittee reverses the policy of Congress, nullifies the agricultural marketing act, and brings joy and gladness to the heart of every cotton and grain gambler in New York and Chicago.

Then I find again that the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] on page 7796 of the RECORD, says:

Why this discrimination against agriculture in favor of the stock-ticker boys? And that, too, at the very point where agriculture converts its yearly labor into cash through marketing. I challenge a reading, line by line, of the statement of the chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Virginia, and find one solitary statement therein in which this cut of 47 per cent is justified on the ground of economy. His able and broad statement was filled with criticism of the activities of the Federal Farm Board and of cooperative marketing associations in the country.

Now, listen to my friend from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN] (p. 7782):

Why this discrimination against agriculture? And that, too, at the very point where agriculture converts its yearly labor into cash through marketing. I challenge you to read line by line the statement of the chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Virginia, and find one solitary statement therein in which this cut of 47 per cent is justified on the ground of economy. His able and broad statement is filled with criticism of the activities of the Federal Farm Board and of cooperative marketing associations in this country.

[Laughter.]

Then my friend from New York says, soaring into the very clouds of eloquence (p. 7796):

You may wonder at my interest in this situation. Maybe I am unique in looking beyond my nose and unrolling the curtain of the future and seeing out yonder in the not distant future to the day when organized consumers in great centers like New York and Chicago will be grasping the hands of organized producers throughout the land and wiping out thereby the greatest burden that rests upon the backs of both—the burden of distribution and cost of the manipulation of gamblers.

Then my friend from Texas, in his time, says (p. 7782):

You may wonder at my interest in this situation. Maybe I am unique in looking beyond my nose and unrolling the curtain of the future and seeing out yonder in the distance to the coming of the day when organized consumers in great centers like New York and Chicago will be grasping the hands of organized producers throughout the land and wiping out thereby the greatest burden that rests upon the backs of both—the burden of distribution.

[Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I wanted to inquire if the gentleman appeared to be seeing double?

Mr. WOODRUM. It seems so.

Mr. HART. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. HART. Does the gentleman recall that I objected to some of the extravagant language that the gentleman from New York was using with reference to these merchants who distributed grain and so forth for the farmer? I did not realize at that time that the language had been furnished to the gentleman by the lobbyists of the Farm Board.

Mr. WOODRUM. Of course I do not know who furnished the language, and that is a matter, I am sure, the Congress and the country will await with a great deal of interest. But I must pass on.

I find the gentleman from New York, on page 7797 of the RECORD, said this:

If cooperative marketing under the agricultural marketing act were not succeeding, the Macedonian cry of one cotton gambler to another would not sound up to heaven, "Help me, Cassius, or I sink!" And who is "me"? The fellow who has ridden the bent backs of cotton farmers of the South and wheat growers of the North and West until the income for over 75 years of such riding has been less than $300 a year for each family. Let us get right on this thing, my colleagues. I stand for the rights of organized labor and have always stood for it. By the same token I stand for the right of agriculture to organize. The right to organize, to exercise the inalienable right to market its own products in its own way in keeping with the intent of the marketing act which Congress passed two years ago.

Then the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN], in that deep, resonant voice of his, says:

If cooperative marketing under the agricultural marketing act were not succeeding, the Macedonian cry of one cotton gambler to another would not sound up to heaven, "Help me, Cassius, or I sink!"—

And so on, to the end of the paragraph. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, this is all more or less in good fun——

Mr. LEAVITT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. LEAVITT. Does the gentleman not think he should place the blame on the bad example set by Al Smith and Franklin Roosevelt in making the same tariff speech? [Laughter.]

Mr. WOODRUM. I was just about to remark on that when my friend interrupted me. Now, I think, seriously, Congress ought to do something about this. It has become so that it is dangerous for a Member to go out in the open market and buy a good speech. [Laughter.]

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. PARSONS. Are they offered at a discount, as much as everything else?

Mr. WOODRUM. I would like to know what these speeches cost, if in fact they were purchased, which, of course, I doubt. But it is dangerous for a man to go out in the open market now and buy a good speech and read it and in his mind's eye picture how his constituents will thrill with ecstasy and pride when they see how their able and eloquent Congressman has risen to the heights of logic and forceful argument in defense of their interest, when on the next page he may pick up the same speech by some other Member. [Laughter.]

I think we really ought to take cognizance of this fact and try to pass a law. For instance, have some clearing house here so that when we want a good speech we could be sure we would get it fresh and unused and not meet it the next day delivered by some other Member of the House of Representatives. These gentlemen are both useful Members of this House, and I hope that our good friends who have waxed so eloquent, though used such bad judgment, when election time comes will not find themselves, one up in New York and the other down in Texas, hollering "Help me Cassius, or I sink!" [Laughter and applause.]

A parallel comparison of portions of addresses delivered, or supposed to have been delivered, in the House of Representatives on April 8, 1932, by Hon. JAMES P. BUCHANAN and Hon.

F. H. LAGUARDIA, respectively. This does not purport to be the entire speech of either gentleman.

(P. 7781.) H. R. 10022. Speech of Hon. JAMES P. BUCHANAN, of Texas, in the House of Representatives, Friday, April 8, 1932.

The House in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had under consideration the bill H. R. 10022, the independent offices appropriation bill.

Congress committed this country, by the passage of the agricultural marketing act, to the policy of Government aid to cooperative-marketing associations owned, controlled, and managed by farmers. That was three years ago. The action of this subcommittee reverses the policy of Congress, nullifies the agricultural marketing act, and brings joy and gladness of heart to every cotton and grain gambler in New York and Chicago.

The Budget estimate for the work of the Federal Farm Board, carrying out the mandate of Congress under the marketing act, was $1,880,000. This subcommittee has cut that estimate $880,000, or approximately 47 per cent, while there is no other item in the independent offices bill, covering 56 measures and dozens of items, where the cut has been above 20 per cent.

* * * * *

(P. 7782.) Why this discrimination against agriculture? And that, too, is the very point where agriculture converts its yearly labor into cash through marketing. I challenge you to read line by line the statement of the chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Virginia, and find one solitary statement therein in which this cut of 47 per cent is justified on the grounds of economy. His able and broad statement was filled with criticism of the activities of the Federal Farm Board and of cooperative-marketing associations in the country. There is not a word said about economy in that remarkable presentation.

You may wonder at my interest in this situation. That accounts for my interest in this matter; I am talking for these people as well as for farmers. The consumer has a vital and direct interest in agriculture; agriculture has a direct and vital interest in the consumer. They are just as interdependent as any two forces in our economic system can be interdependent.

(P. 7796.) H. R. 10022. Speech of Hon. FIORELLO H. LAGUARDIA, of New York, in the House of Representatives, Friday, April 8, 1932.

The House in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had under consideration the bill H. R. 10022, the independent offices appropriation bill.

This country is committed, by the passage of the agricultural marketing act, to the policy of Government aid to cooperative marketing associations owned, controlled, and managed by farmers. That passed three years ago. The action of this subcommittee reverses the policy of Congress, nullifies the agricultural marketing act, and brings joy and gladness of heart to every cotton and grain gambler in New York, Chicago, Dallas, New Orleans, and elsewhere.

The Budget estimate for the work of the Federal Farm Board, carrying out the mandate of Congress under the marketing act, was $1,880,000. This subcommittee has cut that estimate $880,000, or approximately 47 per cent, while there is no other item in the independent offices bill, covering 56 pages and dozens of items, where the cut has been above 5 or 6 per cent.

Why this discrimination against agriculture in favor of the stock-ticker boys? And that, too, at the very point where agriculture converts its yearly labor into cash through marketing. I challenge a reading, line by line, of the statement of the chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Virginia, to find one solitary statement therein in which this cut of 47 per cent is justified on the grounds of economy. His able and broad statement was filled with criticism of the activities of the Federal Farm Board and of cooperative-marketing associations in the country. There is not a word said about economy in that remarkable presentation.

You may wonder at my interest in this situation. Maybe I am unique in looking beyond my nose and unrolling the curtain of the future and seeing out yonder in the not-distant future to the day when organized consumers in great centers like New York and Chicago will be grasping the hands of organized producers throughout the land and wiping out thereby the greatest burden that rests upon the backs of both—the burden of distribution and the cost of the manipulation of gamblers. That accounts for my interest in this matter; I am talking for these people. The consumer has a vital and direct interest in agriculture; agriculture has a direct and vital interest in the consumer. They are just as interdependent as any two forces in our economic system can be interdependent. That representative of the consumer in this body who fails to recognize this fact is failing to measure to the high standards of statesmanship which the country demands so much in these distressing times.

(Page 7782.) But if I had no interest in these matters, if I were thoroughly indifferent to the interests of my own constituents in this item, there is another reason why I would support a decent portion of the amount which this subcommittee has indecently cut from the estimates of the Budget. I agree with Elbert Hubbard, who says, "I judge the character of an institution by the enemies it makes." Who are the enemies of cooperative marketing among farmers in this country? Every farm organization is supporting the efforts of the Federal Farm Board. The American Farm Bureau Federation, the Farmers' Union, the National Grange, the National Committee of Farm Organizations, and all cooperative associations, whether or not they have been aided by the Farm Board, are unanimous in their support of my amendment to the Appropriations Committee report.

* * * * *

(Page 7783.) When you have a farm relief act which has such great potentialities in it for the benefit of the farmers and our country, do not try to destroy it because of a little carbuncle on its neck. Cut out the carbuncle by amending the act.

I say without hesitation or fear of contradiction—the private marketing agencies—the American Cotton Shippers Association, with a membership of only 800, and their allied interests, who have sucked the blood of southern farmers ever since Eli Whitney invented the cotton gin on the back porch of the widow of Gen. Nathanael Greene; the grain trade, the speculator and gambler in foods and clothing; the New York and New Orleans Cotton Exchanges; the Chicago Grain Exchange—are the forces who are fighting this act and who are in favor of allowing the work of the subcommittee to stand unamended, because they know that it injures cooperative marketing in this country. To destroy the Farm Board would set the wheels of agricultural progress back a half century.

* * * * *

(P. 7784.) In my experience of 20 years on the floor of the House this is the boldest attempt which paid propaganda has ever undertaken to influence congressional action. As far as I am concerned, if there were no other reasons to move me, I would find myself fighting under the flag of the organized cooperative farmers of America rather than under the black flag of the slushers whose well-marked trail I have pointed out to you in this speech. Under whose flag are you going to stand? The issue is clear-cut and unmistakable.

Why are they fighting this act? They say that cooperative marketing has not succeeded. They convict themselves of misrepresentation in their own testimony. They know cooperative (Page 7796.) But if I had no interest in these matters, if I were thoroughly indifferent to the interests of my own constituents in this item, there is another reason why I would support the efforts of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN] to restore a decent portion of the amount which this subcommittee has indecently cut from the estimates of the Budget. I agree with Elbert Hubbard, who says, "I judge the character of an institution by the enemies it makes." Who are the enemies of the cooperative marketing among farmers in this country? Every farm organization is supporting the efforts of the gentleman from Texas to treat the Federal Farm Board and its activities decently. The American Farm Bureau Federation, the Farmers' Union, the National Grange, the National Committee of Farm Organizations, and all cooperative associations, whether or not they have been aided by the Farm Board, are unanimous in their suport of the efforts of the gentleman from Texas. Who is against them? I say witnout hesitation or fear of contradiction—the private marketing agencies.

The American Cotton Shippers' Association, with a membership of 800 only, who have sucked the blood of southern farmers ever since Eli Whitney invented the cotton gin on the back porch of the widow of Gen. Nathanael Greene; the grain trade; the speculator and gambler in foods and clothing; the New York and New Orleans Cotton Exchanges; the Chicago Grain Exchange—these are the forces who are fighting this act and who are in favor of allowing the work of the subcommittee to stand unamended, because they know (p. 9906) that it kills cooperative marketing in this country. It sets the wheels of agricultural progress back a half century. And what are their methods? That is what gets me. I invite your attention to pages 393 and 394 of the hearings before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, United States Senate, this Congress, on November 24, 25, 27, and 28, 1931.

(P. 7796.) In my experience of 14 years on the floor of the House this is the boldest attempt which paid propaganda has ever undertaken to influence congressional action. As far as I am concerned, if there were no other reasons to move me, I would find myself fighting under the flag of the organized cooperative farmers of America rather than under the black flag of the slushers whose well-marked trail I have pointed out to you in this public document. Under whose flag are you going to stand? The issue is clear-cut and unmistakable.

Why are they fighting this act? They say that cooperative marketing has not succeeded. They convict themselves of lying in their own testimony. They know cooperative marketing is marketing is succeeding, and that is why they want to beat it, strangle it, hamstring it. Am I justified in making this statement? Let me read from the telegram:

"We feel that our existence is at stake and that something must be done immediately, and will be if we have the moral [God forbid—'moral!'] and financial support of the cotton trade."

Why are they trying to beat this act, to hamstring it? There is the answer to it: "Our existence is at stake." Why is it at stake? Because cooperative marketing has made more progress since the agricultural marketing act was passed in 1929 and the Government put its seal upon it than it had made in 50 years previously. If cooperative marketing under the agricultural marketing act were not succeeding, the Macedonian cry of one cotton gambler to another would not sound up to heaven—"Help me, Cassius, or I sink!" And who is "me"? The net fellow who has ridden the bent backs of cotton farmers of the South until his income for over 75 years of such riding has been less than $300 a year for each family. Let us get right on this thing, my colleagues. I stand for the rights of free-born American citizens to protect themselves against organized greed, and have always stood for them. By the same token I stand for the right of agriculture to organize. The right to organize, to exercise the inalienable right to market its own products for its own benefit in its own God-given way!

(P. 7784.) How were they going to influence Congress? What are their methods? What was the language just read by me? Is there anything written between the lines that we can see? Are there hidden, devious ways of obtaining congressional or legislative action? If so, I would like to drag them out, let the rays of a noonday sun shine upon them that we might see them and honest men in every calling pass judgment thereon.

I want to call your attention to the language in the telegram which I have just read:

"In addition to this amount, $100,000, the firms of Clayton and McFadden will be solicited direct."

Who are the firms of Clayton and McFadden? They are the two biggest cotton firms in the world. Mr. Clayton is regarded as the greatest cotton man in the world. And why did not they allot him a certain amount of this fund as his contribution to this assessment of $100,000, as they allotted $10,000 to Dallas, $10,000 to Houston, $10,000 to Memphis? There is a nigger in the woodpile here, and I want to see it. This telegram means this: That you little pikers in Memphis and Houston and Dallas and Savannah have got to raise a minimum of $100,000, and if that does not do the job of repealing this act, then Clayton and McFadden will put up the difference.

I want to call your attention to the language in the telegram which I have just read:

"In addition to this amount, the firm of Clayton & McFadden will be solicited direct."

Who is the firm of Clayton & McFadden? It is the biggest cotton firm in the world. The head of it, Mr. Clayton, is regarded as the greatest cotton man in the world. This telegram means this: That the little pikers in Memphis and Houston and Dallas and Savannah have got to raise a minimum of $100,000, and if that does not do the job of repealing this act, then Clayton & McFadden Co. will put up the difference, and the sky is the limit.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN].

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed out of order, and I will not take more than three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. PARKS. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object——

The CHAIRMAN. As the Chair understands, it is a matter of privilege that the gentleman from Illinois wishes to discuss.

Mr. PARKS. I did not intend to object, but I wanted to know if we were going to take an hour with reference to changing the name of Porto Rico?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I want to call to the attention of the House a point which I consider of very, very high personal privilege, and I want to read to the Members of the House an extract from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD which lies on our desks this morning, which impugns the honesty of purpose of every Member of this House. I think it is uncalled for. I do not think it was deliberately done on the other side of the Capitol, but nevertheless it has been done, and I think it should be called to the attention of the House, and I think a clarifying statement should come from the distinguished Senator who made the statement printed on page 9897 of yesterday's CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order. I am sure, knowing my friend as I do, that I would probably agree with him entirely in his contention, and in resenting an insult to any Member, but, regardless of what any Member of some other body has done with reference to alleged actions of any Member of this body, in order to preserve the friendliness and the amity and the comity that exist, and should exist between the two Houses of Congress, it has always been the rule that no criticism or censure could be made from this floor concerning any Member of the body in the other end of the Capitol. While what the gentleman is about to say probably may be deserved, we must observe the rules and follow the wise precedents of the House.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I will not refer specifically to any Member in another body.

Mr. BLANTON. But the gentleman said that a retraction should come from the Senator.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, may I be heard on the point of order? The article to which the gentleman is about to refer also appeared in the newspapers this morning.

Mr. BRITTEN. Oh, yes. All the newspapers.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, my point of order is that it is against the House rules and precedents and is not going to bring about any better situation between the two bodies, who must continue to transact business with each other, if such criticisms are to be made upon this floor. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from Illinois has no right to refer to any statement that appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD from any Senator in the other body in this Capitol.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, there is no rule that prevents a Member from reading from the RECORD any matter published therein.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would call attention to a ruling made by Mr. Speaker Longworth on May 6, 1930—RECORD, pages 8453–8456—in which he said:

> A Member of the House may not reflect in any way in debate on the floor of the House on the actions, speeches, or proceedings of a Senator, or of the Senate itself.

The Chair is inclined to hold that the matter the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] refers to comes under that ruling, and it would not be in order to discuss on the floor of the House a speech made in the Senate.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, does that prevent a Member from reading from the RECORD matter which may be published therein by the Senate?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it does. It is commenting on a speech made in the Senate, and the Chair thinks the ruling of Mr. Speaker Longworth should be followed.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I will modify my position to say that I want to quote something from the newspapers that has nothing whatever to do with the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, except in so far as it may be more or less like matter appearing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that if it is in reference to a speech made in the Senate the same ruling would apply.

Mr. PARKS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PARKS. If a Member in another body calls a Member of this House a thief, do the rules forbid the Members of this House from referring to that speech, though it be made in the other body?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of that opinion.

Mr. BLANTON. In that situation the gentleman could call him to account when they met.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, under the rules of the House we have the right to move to expunge from the RECORD statements made by a Senator criticizing Members of the House.

Mr. BLANTON. No; I make a point of order against that. The House has no control whatever over any matter that any Senator inserts in the RECORD as a part of the Senate proceeding, and the matter could be reviewed only by action of the Joint Committee on Printing, or by a joint resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. The House has no control over the proceedings of the Senate or what they put in the RECORD.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SCHAFER. Is it the rule that a Member of the other body may on the floor of that body accuse every Member of the House of accepting bribes on legislation pending in the House and the Members of the House have no authority and no right to call to the attention of the country and of the other body that serious charge and ask for proof? If that be so, we might as well abolish the House of Representatives and let the Senate do all the legislating.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the decision made by Mr. Speaker Longworth applies to such a case.

Mr. BRITTEN. Very well, Mr. Chairman; I will proceed in order.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GREEN. In that connection, Mr. Chairman, a few days ago in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD there was a long statement inserted in an extension of remarks by a Member of the other body in which some doctor diagnosed the mental ability of the Members of the House and Senate and determined the weight of the brain of the Senate and the weight of the brain of the House on the average, and, of course, being put in on the other side, it showed them far superior. I wonder if that is subject to a point of order?

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is the gentleman from Illinois is recognized to proceed in order.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, I think this is a question that ought to be settled. Mr. Chairman, under a parliamentary inquiry, I understood the Chair to rule that a Member of the House was not allowed to quote from the RECORD, which is the official document of the proceedings of Congress. If that be so, we might as well abolish the RECORD. It seems to me that any Member of the House or Senate has a perfect right to quote verbatim from the RECORD. Consequently I would like to have a ruling from the Chair in order that this point may be determined at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. Permit the Chair to read the opinion of Mr. Speaker Longworth on which the Chair relied when he made his ruling:

> The question raised by the gentleman from New York is whether a Member may reflect in any way on the floor of the House against the actions, speeches, or proceedings of another Member or of the body itself.
>
> To put it in another way, Shall the House, notwithstanding any adverse action by the other body, adhere to the provisions laid down in Jefferson's Manual, which have always governed?
>
> The answer of the Chair is emphatically "Yes." Indeed, it appears to the Chair that it has become all the more necessary, if the rules of comity between the two Houses are to be at all preserved, that Members of the House should be limited even more rigidly than ever by Jefferson's rules prohibiting reference in terms of the slightest disparagement of the remarks or actions of Members or any of the proceedings of the other body.
> If no rules of comity are to be followed in either House, then legislation may become chaos, indeed.
>
> In conclusion the Chair will say that so long as he remains Presiding Officer of this body he will see to it that the rules of Jefferson's Manual, in so far as they apply to the friendly relations between the Members of the two Houses and the Houses themselves, shall be enforced with the utmost rigidity, not only in the letter but in the spirit.

Mr. BRITTEN. Does the Chair hold that under the rules a Member of the House can not read extracts from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD?

The CHAIRMAN. That was the ruling of Speaker Longworth, and that is the rule until the House changes it.

Mr. BLANTON. If reference had been made to the gentleman from Illinois, he would have the God-given right to rise to a question of privilege. There is the distinction. Whatever reference was made was made to a man who is dead and gone, and the gentleman from Illinois is not privileged to rise and defend some one who is dead and gone.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MICHENER. I think we are all familiar with the rule as laid down by the former Speaker of the House, but permit me to suggest this, that the House has established a precedent in a case where a Senator made some disparaging remarks about a former Member of the House. It was held at that time that a resolution expressing the views of the House might be introduced in the House and acted upon by the House and sent to the Senate. So there is a way, established by precedent, whereby the House may communicate to the Senate its feelings in reference to any observation made on the floor of the Senate concerning a Member of the House or the House as a unit.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICHENER. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Did not the action which the House took in regard to the remarks made by a certain Senator against the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. Cramton, involve the privileges of the House, and would it not be proper, if the House were acting as the House rather than as in the Committee of the Whole, for a Member to rise to a question of the privileges of the House and present a resolution condemning the action of the Senate or a Senator because of aspersions which have been made against this body?

Mr. MICHENER. That is the opinion of the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. DYER. If the gentleman will permit, we have another precedent in the case of former Senator Reed of my State, when he criticized and attacked former Representative Volstead. We passed a resolution and sent it to the Senate asking that the language be corrected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will observe that under the debate which is in progress now the matter of privilege would not have to be passed on, but in the opinion of the Chair matters that were excluded under Mr. Speaker Longworth's ruling would have to be excluded in debate now, and the gentleman from Illinois can present his matter of privilege to the House but not to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BRITTEN. Then does the Chair rule that I am not privileged under the rules of the House to read from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has so held.

Mr. BRITTEN. Then I respectfully appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, pending the appeal, may I ask the gentleman from Illinois a question? I want to ask him if it is not a fact that the word "Congressmen" refers to and embraces Senators as well as Members of the House?

Mr. BRITTEN. No; not in this application.

Mr. BLANTON. The word "Congressmen" has always been a generic term that embraces both Members of the Senate and the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I shall consume but a few moments of the five minutes allowed me under the rule to discuss the proposition of the appeal made by the gentleman from Illinois from the decision of the Chair. Anyone who is familiar with the rules of the House and their proper application under circumstances like these, by all of the precedents and all of the constructions, must know that in the Committee of the Whole it is not proper to take advantage of the gentleman's position. When we get back into the House the gentleman can well raise the question of privilege by a proper resolution. The Chair has read to the Committee of the Whole House an opinion which was almost a cause célèbre in this House on the matter of parliamentary construction as to the proper relationships of comity between the two Houses of Congress. I remember with a great deal of interest the very elaborate and very learned, and in my opinion very correct, decision of the late Speaker Longworth, excerpts from which have been read by the present occupant of the chair. The present occupant of the chair in his construction of the rules of the House, operating in the Committee of the Whole, is absolutely correct. There can not be any question about that. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. And he is bound by this precedent.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Not only that, but the Chair has ruled in accordance with the wise and well-considered opinion rendered by Speaker Longworth, after long and careful consideration. I appeal to the members of the Committee of the Whole to sustain the Chair, regardless of what the gentleman has in mind.

I am somewhat in sympathy with the gentleman's attitude upon this question, but it seems to me it is a question that involves proper construction of the rules of the House and, in my opinion, the chairman has correctly construed the rule. [Applause.]

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I will withdraw my appeal from the decision of the Chair, and shall proceed for the five minutes that have been yielded me.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for five minutes, and will proceed in order.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, the newspapers of the country, through their various press associations, this morning carry a suggestion that Chicago bankers hired Members of Congress to influence legislation in this House, and I say that this is not the truth. [Applause.]

There is not money enough in Chicago to do that. There is not money enough in New York to do that. You can not hire Congressmen to influence legislation. That is not the way legislation is influenced.

I want to read to you an extract from the papers and see if you do not agree with me that something more than what appears in the paper has got to be said in order to take from our shoulders this cloak of dishonesty that does not belong there, and every Member of the House and every member of the press gallery knows it as well as you and I do.

The subject matter before the House some years ago was the McFadden banking bill. It provided for the establishment of branch banks throughout the country. I think this was in 1926, or thereabouts. Many of you will recall that the matter was bitterly fought, and now, at this late day, the language as carried in the newspapers is that Chicago bankers—

Hired a skillful and persuasive professional lobbyist and paid him a large salary to come to Washington.

The papers even went farther and said that Congressmen were hired for pay to influence this legislation. They said, and worse than that, they say the Chicago bankers hired some Congressmen to oppose legislation for branch banking.

Are we going to sit idly by and allow stuff like this to be spread around the country? I do not care who spreads it, he has got to account to me as one Member of this House, and there are four hundred-and-odd others equally as proud of their reputation as I am of mine. [Applause.]

We all know that legislation is not influenced by money, and the men in the press gallery know it as well as we do.

If a lobbyist came here from Chicago in 1926 to influence banking legislation, this is the first time I have heard of it. He did not present himself to me nor do I recall hearing anything about him or his reputed activities. It sounds like a fairy tale to me.

Legislation may be influenced by friendship, by society, by well-written newspaper articles or editorials, if you please, but never by hire of Congressmen, and I resent this broad statement so gratuitously made by a Member of the other branch of Congress.

Mr. SCHAFER rose.

Mr. BRITTEN. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. SCHAFER. I just want to be certain that the gentleman is not criticizing newspapermen for correctly reporting a statement made on the floor of a supposedly great legislative body by a politician who holds public office. [Applause.]

Mr. BRITTEN. The gentlemen in the press gallery know that I would not criticize any newspaper. The newspaper is a great business unto itself. It has its own methods for spreading the news and educating the public. Newspapers and magazines are the greatest educators on earth. They certainly mold public sentiment, and that is my principal complaint concerning the remarks made in another body on yesterday. They were carried to all sections of the earth, notwithstanding their unwarranted scandal and error. I find no fault and I have no complaint of the newspapers, but I do object to any individual—I do not care whether he is a Member of the Senate or in the gutters of the streets—if he seriously states that Members of Congress (plural) are hired to influence legislation. It is a deliberate misstatement. [Applause.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PARSONS].

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to include at the close of my remarks a table showing the appropriations for the year 1933.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Chairman, much has been written and circulated through the press during the past few weeks with reference to appropriations passed by the first session of the Seventy-second Congress. To read the metropolitan newspapers, one is led to believe that the President, the House of Representatives, and the United States Senate have effected little or no economy. The President, in what the newspapers said was an attack on Congress, seems to have forgotten all of the savings made, except what the Bureau of the Budget eliminated in its estimates.

Certain chains of newspapers have been interested in foisting a sales tax upon the American people. Owners of such sheets constitute an insidious lobby, which swarms not only around Congress but around the White House and the country at large, poisoning the minds of the people toward their representatives in Congress, all because Congress defeated the iniquitous sales tax.

The metropolitan press, owned and controlled, in whole or in part, and in many instances largely influenced, by the international banking group and great commercial interests, is doing more to break down the confidence of the people in their Government and prolong the depression than any other agency in the United States to-day. [Applause.]

The reportorial staff in Washington are a high-class set of ladies and gentlemen. I have the highest personal regard for them all. I know they want to be fair and send the truth to the readers of the publications which employ them, but in many instances they are prohibited from doing so because of orders issued by their masters or the dispatch is not printed if it tells the facts. I appeal to their sense of justice, I appeal to the honor and integrity of the owners and chief editors to carry the truth to the people. As an exponent of the rights of free speech and free press, I have a right to criticize the action of the news services for the false and gross misrepresentation of facts on the events that have happened in Congress during the past few weeks.

Sensational and spectacular headlines sell the newspaper and wondrously appeal to popular favor. In seeking to commercialize upon the unfortunate condition of the country the press is indicting itself by a violation of the very spirit of the freedom of the press. How much longer, O Lord, will this sinister influence try to intimidate Congress? How much longer will this same force try to influence and inflame the minds of the people against their Representatives and against their Government? If the practice is continued, just as surely as I stand here there will come a day when the press will be muzzled, because the truth will have been known, and the people as a unit will demand that false and malicious misrepresentation cease; and when that day comes the press of this country will have no one to blame but itself.

By referring to the actual facts with reference to appropriation bills passed by this House of Representatives I call attention to the fact that the appropriations for the year 1931 were $3,750,971,431; for 1932 the appropriations were $3,752,667,053. These appropriations are exclusive of interest and debt settlements and extra appropriations, and involve only the nine major departmental appropriation bills. The appropriations for the fiscal year 1933 as reported to and passed by the House represent a saving of $623,301,222. The Senate has acted on only two of the major supply bills, and it is estimated and expected that that body will further increase savings to an extent of $80,000,000 to $100,000,000. The truth of the matter is that in spite of the President's message, which was wholly misleading and unjustified by the facts, and in spite of the propaganda circulated through the metropolitan press, an unprecedented economy has been and will be effected by the House and the Senate of more than $700,000,000, which the President talked about in his message on May 5. The savings may be even greater.

Mr. ARNOLD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARSONS. I yield.

Mr. ARNOLD. Does not the gentleman think that the propaganda which the gentleman speaks of is doing more to break down representative government in this country than any other one thing?

Mr. PARSONS. The gentleman is right. I said at the beginning of my remarks that it was doing more to break down the confidence of the people and prolong the depression than anything else.

Mr. ARNOLD. And to break down representative government.

Mr. PARSONS. The gentleman is correct.

The President knew these reductions had been made when his message was written. Furthermore he knew that his advisers had helped to defeat the major item in the economy bill. Some of his spokesmen are seeking to add appropriations to the bill now pending in the House. Consistency where art thou? The language should be changed to "Inconsistency, thou art a jewel." It appears that everyone is in favor of economy except on those items which he wishes to preserve for himself or his friends. That specific criticism was contained in the President's message, and yet we find him and his closest advisers practicing the same thing on Capitol Hill that he criticized Members of Congress for on May 5. [Applause.] I submit it comes with poor grace, even from the highest office in the land, to assassinate the honor and integrity of Members on both sides of the aisle. It reflects upon Republicans as well as Democrats, and I am sure it is resented by every Member of this House.

In addition, the House passed a tax bill which, with the savings mentioned above, will balance the Budget for the fiscal year 1933, if Secretary Mills's figures are accurate. Why did not the press gallery give all these facts to the country when they reported the President's message? Why did not the press tell this to the country when they reported the action of the House on the economy bill? Why did not the headlines tell this to the country alongside of the criticisms which have been heaped upon Congress? Let the press of the country answer. They still have time to redeem themselves in the eyes of the Congress and of the people.

The opportunity is in the hands of the press gallery. I challenge them to rise to the occasion. Let us take the mask of political hypocrisy off the whole proposition and be fair about it. [Applause.]

The table referred to is as follows:

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I shall devote myself to the bill under consideration on this Calendar Wednesday. There has been a great struggle for 10 or more years to keep sacred Calendar Wednesday in its place, but with not much success.

Both parties at the beginning of each Congress have assured the membership, and particularly the chairman of the nonprivileged committees—and that means most of them—that Calendar Wednesday would be observed, and would not be set aside. No leader on either side has been able to carry out that well-meant purpose. It is assumed that we are within six or eight weeks of the end of this session. We have canceled in this session several Calendar Wednesdays, and now that we have come to the sixteenth Committee on Insular Affairs, and lo and behold, we are making use of Calendar Wednesday, and have gone into Committee of the Whole for bills called up by the Committee on Insular Affairs, and they have brought up for consideration the absolute irreducible minimum in public legislation—House Joint Resolution 149, a bill to correct the spelling of the name of Porto Rico. [Laughter.] The debate this morning has been fast and furious. Porto Rico has not been mentioned. [Laughter.]

There are in the Committee on Insular Affairs important matters of legislation with reference to Porto Rico and the Virgin Islands that should receive attention of this committee. But we have this bill to correct the spelling of the name of the island of Porto Rico, and there are at least seven "whereases" in the bill. For some reason or other we are going to use up a lot of time and then next week and the week after that we shall do away with calendar Wednesday, and so on to the end of the session, unless it is decided to kill off one or two Wednesdays with some light-weight bill.

It is now 10 years and 3 months since that committee had one Calendar Wednesday call. That committee now has numerous bills of considerable importance upon the calendar, with no chance of their being reached except by unanimous consent or by rule. Calendar Wednesday is either a good day or it is nothing. It is supposed to be sacred and to guarantee the various nonprivileged committees a chance to be heard. But to-day we have the observance of Calendar Wednesday with this bill on a great, a gigantic problem—a bill providing that the spelling of Porto Rico shall be changed to the Spanish style Puerto Rico.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Texas. Let me inform the gentleman from Washington that he did not make the rules of the House, and these bills are here and we are considering them because the chairman of the committee is away.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Nevertheless, I think it is a waste of time.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Texas. Perhaps it is, but is this the only day that the gentleman has ever seen wasted?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I admit that I have and am wasting time in trying to protect each and every Calendar Wednesday. As to Porto Rico, it has been spelled "Porto Rico" for 33 years. The bill will pass, the name will be changed, and I hope that the historians will mark the act as one of the great achievements of the Seventy-second Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the words "exclusive patrimony" and the words "history and traditions of the people," on page 1, of the joint resolution.

Until the last few years the Department of Justice has handled the legal business of the Government of the United States. It has always represented the Government of the United States in legal matters before the courts of the country. When our departments were first created by the fundamental law that brought them into existence they did not have a big legal coterie in them. They got their legal advice from the Department of Justice. They got their opinions on legal matters and were guided by them, from the Department of Justice, and it has only been within the last few years that there has grown up in every department of this Government, in every bureau if you please, a big legal department, with high salaried attorneys procured through the civil service, some of whom would not know how to give a proper opinion on a question of law any more than would a wire-haired terrier.

I put in the RECORD the other day, and I wish you would get it and read it, a list giving names and salaries of 876 lawyers who are drawing big salaries from the Government in the Veterans' Bureau, and out of that 876 there are probably 50 who are real lawyers.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Are they all lawyers?

Mr. BLANTON. No. They are what I would call "lawyerettes." We must remedy that situation before we adjourn. We must take these 876 lawyers off of the pay roll. We must take off of the pay roll the army of lawyers in the numerous bureaus, and stop this waste. That is what is heading this Government into bankruptcy.

If you will look at the expense account of those 876 lawyers lolling around everywhere on the Veterans' Administration pay roll, see the amounts of money they draw monthly for travel, per diem, and other expenses, in addition to their salary, it will astound you; and they are losing cases all the time for the Government. I think before we adjourn that we ought to separate from that bureau and from all other bureaus in Washington every lawyer now wasting the people's money. We ought to put the control of Veterans' Bureau cases and all of its other legal matters into the hands of the Department of Justice and make it responsible to the country for a proper handling of the Government's legal business.

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. I agree with what the gentleman has said, but we are working now on a proposition to cut down the expenses of the Department of Justice. How could they function if we put this increased load on them?

Mr. BLANTON. You could take 5 per cent of the amount of money that these 876 lawyers in the Veterans' Bureau are spending every day, counting their salaries, and give it to the Department of Justice, and you would get better results and more efficiency in behalf of the Government than you are getting now.

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. Let us give the Department of Justice the 5 per cent and let them do it.

Mr. BLANTON. And take all of these little fellows away from this bureau and disconnect them and send them back to $1,440 clerkships where they belong, as that was and still is their real capacity; excepting the few fine lawyers in the bureau daily handicapped by the inefficients.

What are we going to do with the army of lawyers in the Shipping Board, in the Federal Radio Commission, in the State Department, in the War Department, and in the Navy Department? Did you ever attend a court-martial in the Navy or in the Army? It is the most ridiculous affair I ever saw. You go in and you will find seven or eight lines of tables for the press boys. Then you will find the social gallery for the high society of the Navy and the Army family connections. They walk in, in their silks and satins, and they salute, and all that is done before the main show starts, and the whole proceeding is ridiculous and absurd. We should disconnect half of the lawyers in both of these departments from them.

Go down to the Department of Agriculture and ascertain how many high-salaried lawyers they have. Look into their different bureaus. Go to the Department of Commerce, if you please, and look into their many bureaus and see how many high-salaried lawyers they have employed there. We ought to take the lawyers out of all of these departments and let all of them get their legal advice from the Department of Justice, which should handle all of their legal matters, and we would save multiplied millions of dollars for the people of this country. I am going to make a determined, uncompromising fight to effect this saving for the taxpayers of the United States.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Texas. Why not take a few lawyers out of the Veterans' Administration?

Mr. BLANTON. That is what I said a moment ago. The gentleman was occupied and did not hear me. We ought to take these 876 "lawyerettes" away from that bureau before we adjourn. That would save several million dollars annually. We could add a few assistant district attorneys over the country, who are the real men, who furnish the brains and the law when the cases are tried, and make them responsible, under the control of the Department of Justice, and stop this terrible expense and waste.

The district attorneys really try the cases now, and the lawyers for the Veterans' Bureau rarely ever open their mouths. The Federal district attorney and his assistants are the ones who actually handle the cases.

Mr. GOSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. GOSS. Did I understand the gentleman to suggest the abolishment of the general courts-martial in the Army and Navy?

Mr. BLANTON. No.

Mr. GOSS. I do not understand how we could handle it in a foreign country if we wanted to convene a general court-martial, and we abolished that and put it into the Department of Justice. I wish the gentleman would explain that.

Mr. BLANTON. I will explain what I mean to our distinguished military friend from Connecticut; and he is; I can tell his military standing by his bearing.

Mr. GOSS. I wish the gentleman would explain the point about which I asked him.

Mr. BLANTON. I am going to explain it. There ought to be courts-martial during war, but none in peace time. We have too many lawyers connected with the Army and Navy Departments. They are really dead timber.

On last Friday I received a letter from a poor, broken-hearted, widowed mother down in Texas. Her boy was under a charge of desertion. I am sure the gentleman will allow me to talk about the Navy, because that is not his department.

Mr. GOSS. Oh, certainly. I just wanted to get this straightened out in my own mind.

Mr. BLANTON. If it had been in the Army, I would not have mentioned it.

This boy was charged with desertion in peace time. Some of the boys told him he would be court-martialed and probably hanged when he overstayed his leave, and they scared that boy nearly to death, and he pulled out for home, and he was scared to go back, so deserted. They caught him finally, of course; and, under a charge of that kind, something that any unsophisticated country boy from the farm anywhere in the United States could have done, without any criminal intent involving moral turpitude, he was hauled up before a court-martial.

Mr. GOSS. Before a summary court instead of a court-martial, was it not?

Mr. BLANTON. Probably; but either was equally ridiculous, under the circumstances. They gave him about three years and forfeited all of his pay; and his poor mother needs him badly. When I think about what they did to that poor country boy, and then remember what they did to a public Cabinet officer like Albert B. Fall, who was convicted of accepting $100,000 bribe and giving away the oil lands of the people that were worth hundreds of millions of dollars, and he was assessed punishment of only one year and fined $100,000, and then when he had served a few months of it they turned him out yesterday and did not even make him pay a dollar of that fine——

Mr. COLE of Iowa. He still has it to pay.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, no; they have turned him out. They should have said, "Whenever you want to walk out of the door of that New Mexico penitentiary, you first pay what you owe the Government of the United States."

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. GOSS. I am interested in what the gentleman is saying, and I have followed it in the Committee on Military Affairs, but I understood the gentleman to say something about doing away with general courts-martial. I do not see how that could be done if we had a vessel in a foreign port or an army in a foreign country. How could we do away with the general courts-martial?

Mr. BLANTON. I would like to see them do away with it in peace time. Of course, it is necessary in war time. Now, I will cite the gentleman to his Army. I remember about Billy Mitchell, who made some very salutary and valuable suggestions to the Government about consolidations. I agreed with 99 per cent of what Billy Mitchell said.

Mr. GOSS. He would be court-martialed.

Mr. BLANTON. He was court-martialed and tried right here in Washington, and I attended the trial. My friend did not, but I did. I watched that society function take place every day down there for quite a while. They forced Billy Mitchell to resign. They forced him to give up his high commission. What had he done to deserve such punishment in peace time? Given his views on vital questions.

And I remember about our Scotch admiral up in Philadelphia making a salutary recommendation to his Government about the discontinuance of the Philadelphia Navy Yard, if you please, showing that if they would carry out his suggestions this Government could save enormous sums of money every year. How they did punish that admiral for being a real American! I would like to see all courts-martial done away with in peace time.

Mr. BALDRIGE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BLANTON. Just a minute. I want to get rid of this general from the Army first. Then I will come to the admiral from the Navy later.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I wish the gentleman would confine his remarks to how he would have the general courts-martial operate in the Army and Navy if he wants to abolish them. How would we handle it to do justice to the service and to the men tried?

Mr. BLANTON. I would have it just like it is now in war times, that if a man failed to do his duty in war they could court-martial him, and for an offense serious enough stand him up against a brick wall and have him shot at daybreak by the firing squad.

Mr. GOSS. But the gentleman wants to do away with that.

Mr. BLANTON. Only during peace time, which, thank God, is most of the time. I would want them in war time, but I want to get rid of such ridiculous absurdities in peace time, both in the Army and the Navy.

Mr. GOSS. The gentleman wants discipline, does he not?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly. The men can be disciplined by firing them.

Mr. GOSS. After a court-martial.

Mr. BLANTON. No; after a sane hearing. The way the people discipline us Congressmen when they do not like what we do is to fire us at primary time; and it seems to me the knowledge that they can fire us makes us a little more careful what we do up here. Every man in the Army from the little buck private up to the high general, if you please, if he knows that he can be fired in peace time for any dereliction in duty, will be more careful. And likewise with the Navy.

But I did not want to get off on that. I do not want these generals and admirals to divert me from making my speech about surplus lawyers, both inefficient and efficient.

Mr. BALDRIGE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield just at that point for a question?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; certainly.

Mr. BALDRIGE. I would not like to cross swords with the distinguished gentleman from Texas, because he is a rough-and-tumble fighter and I am just a new Congressman without that experience.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, my friend will be able to take care of himself.

Mr. BALDRIGE. But I have been tremendously impressed with the tenacity with which the gentleman from Texas hangs on to these two-bit lawyers, and I would just like to say that I would not want to be up for trial and have the gentleman from Texas as the prosecuting attorney on the other side of the table.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, I may have to defend the gentleman at some of these Navy peace-time courts-martial; and I will give him the best defense I can.

Mr. Chairman, I want to get back to my subject of surplus lawyers.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. WOODRUM. Right at that point I want to ask the gentleman from Texas a question regarding the lawyers in the Veterans' Bureau. I want to say to him that I am in sympathy with his idea that litigated cases ought to be handled by the Department of Justice, and the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs is now concluding arrangements with the Department of Justice to take over the trial of these cases. However, the gentleman must know, because he is informed on the subject, that the actual trial of litigated cases is only an infinitesimal part of the legal work that has to be done by the Veterans' Administration, because the gentleman must remember they have to do with the estates of deceased people.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to tell my friend from Virginia that the Department of Justice, if given 5 per cent of the money now spent by lawyers in the Veterans' Bureau, could better represent the Veterans' Administration on all legal matters, and save the Government millions of dollars annually.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 10 additional minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to say this about General Crowder, and put this flower on his grave: He was one of the most efficient men we have ever had in the United States Army. When preparing the draft act, he picked his lawyers on their merits, and he tried to pick them without regard to political influence.

Mr. GOSS. If that is the case, why would the gentleman abolish those efficient men from the Army and the Navy in connection with court-martial?

Mr. BLANTON. I would do it only in peace time. If you leave it to the Attorney General of the United States to select his attorneys to handle the legal business of the Government in the Federal courts of the United States, he is going to select men qualified to meet the biggest lawyers across the table that exist in the United States; but when you leave it to General Hines, of the Veterans' Bureau, he picks them through the Civil Service, where all on earth they have to do is to be certified by the Civil Service after showing they have stood a bar examination, and have gotten a license or probably have graduated from some law school.

Mr. WOODRUM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. WOODRUM. The gentleman knows the basic law compels the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to get his attorneys through the Civil Service.

Mr. BLANTON. I know that, and that is the reason I want to make a change. Good lawyers can not be secured through the civil service. We must get these surplus lawyers out of all of the bureaus of the different departments of Government and make these departments go to the Department of Justice for their legal help and information. Let me make this suggestion: You can not get legislation out of a committee quickly and pass it. You know that. However, you can get a legislative provision on an appropriation bill any time the House is willing to do it.

If this House wants to get rid of these "lawyerettes" in every bureau, if they are in earnest about it, if they are for retrenchment and want to stop unnecessary expenses, they know they can put a rider on an appropriation bill which will accomplish that purpose if no Member makes a point of order against it. Such a provision would cause all of these lawyers to be removed from these bureaus, and give General Mitchell—a high-class lawyer and a first-class Attorney General—even if he is a Republican, he is a high-class official—give him the right to pick his own lawyers, and I will back the lawyers he picks.

Mr. PARKER of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. PARKER of New York. Did I understand the gentleman to say he is in favor of abolishing the legal staff of the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; in every bureau and department of the Government. I am in favor of every bureau and every department of Government getting its lawyers and its legal advice from the Department of Justice.

Mr. PARKER of New York. Does the gentleman realize that the Interstate Commerce Commission is a highly technical branch of the Government?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; of course. I want to say this to my friend: For 10 years, every time Congress adjourned—and sometimes it would adjourn in March and would not meet until December—I spent every single month of those vacations here in Washington with my force of helpers, and I did have some experts helping me, checking up. I was determined to understand the inside business of the bureaus and commissions of this Government, and I took them up one at a time, and I checked up and familiarized myself with the details of every last one of them. I was not on the Committee on Appropriations then where I could get such knowledge without paying for it. Now I can get it easily. But then I had to pay the men who were helping me. That is how interested I was in the matter, and I think I know as much about the inside workings of that commission and every other bureau of the Government as my friend does.

Mr. PARKER of New York. Does the gentleman mean to say that the men down there do not work?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, they work, but I want to say that you can take half of the money we are spending in that bureau for lawyers and give it to the Department of Justice and they will have better legal information than they now have.

Mr. PARKER of New York. I disagree with the gentleman entirely on that matter.

Mr. BLANTON. The Department of Justice ought to handle the legal end of all such business.

Mr. PARKER of New York. Not in a highly technical branch of the service like the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. BLANTON. Every bureau, then, ought to have a large legal department. It is ridiculous. I am against it.

Mr. PARKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. PARKS. As I understand it, this is a bill to change the spelling of the name of Porto Rico?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes. But we have been indulging in general debate on the good of the Union.

Mr. PARKS. I am just wondering, after we have spent all of this day in this manner, how it is going to help the farmer to change the spelling of Porto Rico.

Mr. BLANTON. If the people who live there are in favor of changing that, I am with them.

Mr. HART. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. HART. Does the gentleman know that we have a couple of learned doctors from the Department of Agriculture now down in Chile looking for wild potatoes, when potatoes in this country are selling for 10 cents a bushel?

Mr. BLANTON. I thank the gentleman for clinching that nail of my argument.

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman put in the RECORD whether or not changing the spelling of Porto Rico will cost anything?

Mr. BLANTON. Those people want it changed. If the people who live in Porto Rico want to spell it "Puerto," let us permit them to do it.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I want to ask the gentleman whether in peace time these cases before courts-martial could not be referred to some local court for trial.

Mr. BLANTON. They could, if the law so provided. The Secretary of the Navy ought to handle such cases simply and sanely, as you and I would handle a piece of business over in Baltimore. If they did not do right, out they would go. That is the way it ought to be handled, in my judgment.

Mr. LINTHICUM. But a man ought to be entitled to a trial.

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly. Proper hearings could be had. To send a poor, unsophisticated farm boy to the brig for three years, with his pay forfeited, for desertion in peace time is ridiculous.

Mr. LINTHICUM. That is the reason I say that such matters ought to be referred to a court during times of peace.

Mr. BLANTON. They should be handled in some saner and simpler way in peace time than by expensive courts-martial.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MAY].

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I have no axes to grind; I have no crows to pick, and no bags in which to put the feathers if I did pick them. I have no criticism to make, no charges to prefer, but I want to make a few suggestions that I hope shall appeal to the sober judgment and right thinking of the membership of this House.

We, of course, must economize in the administrative expense of Government in every possible direction, but with secret plots all over this land by the vicious agencies of Soviet Russia masquerading under the guise and false cloak of pacifists, we should direct our efforts at economy in some other directions, many of which may be utilized; and regardless of the issue I feel that the time has arrived in the Congress of the United States when our constituents and the country are entitled to our best thought, our best efforts, and our best judgment. I am just able to discern from the line of argument here that we sometimes act under the influence of passion or prejudice, sometimes influenced by political considerations in some matters, but I want to take a little while to-day to talk about the proposition pending under the House bill for the reorganization, in effect, of our American Army.

It is my belief that this is the wrong method to take, the wrong course to pursue, with respect to the great arm of our national defense. It is my understanding that one of the gentlemen of the House, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD], said that this country was the greatest and richest country in the world because it had kept out of war.

That is an idle boast. When you come down to the facts of history the record shows that in a period of 150 years this country has had, including the Revolution, six wars, an average of one every 25 years. History discloses the fact that France, a republic, has had three wars in 100 years, or one every 33 years. It has been said, and it has been established by history and by our experience, that we have never entered a war when we were adequately prepared.

Now, I believe that if the Congress of the United States desires to retire 2,000 Army officers from the Regular Army, in a desire to bring about economy in the administration of the affairs of the Army, it ought to be done by amendment to the national defense act and not by the method of appropriation bills. In other words, we are saying to the Army, "We are going to withdraw the funds that make it possible to maintain the national defense."

Now, there is another thing I trust the membership will consider, and that is that if you get sick you naturally want a doctor, and do not call a lawyer to treat you; if you desire to build a house, you want a carpenter and not a Congressman. If you want to know something about military affairs and about the United States Army, you would properly call on the Chief of Staff of the Army. That is what the Committee on Military Affairs has done.

When we thought we needed advice about this matter, we submitted it to the Army authorities, and from the evidence we got from them it appears that the Budget presented by the Army or the Secretary of War was cut by the War Department about $38,000,000 below last year. In addition to that they consent to a reduction of $4,000,000 in connection with the subsistence of the Army, approximately $1,000,000 reduction for clothing and equipage, and approximately $5,000,000 for Army transportation, and for other matters, $400,000, making a total of $45,000,000 below the Budget of last year.

Now, this committee proposes a further reduction of twenty-four million two hundred and some odd thousand dollars, or a total of approximately $68,000,000 below last year.

Mr. LINTHICUM. How much below the Budget of this year?

Mr. MAY. Twenty-four million dollars below the Budget as requested by the Army.

Now, there is one thing that I have always believed in, and that is adequate defense of my country. I am from over in the hills of Kentucky, where my friend Mr. FINLEY comes from. He is an old Stephen Decatur, and I am a young Decatur. "My country, may she always be in the right, but my country right or wrong" is my creed. [Applause.]

Now, in order that I may illustrate the situation just as it is, the testimony of the Chief of Staff of the United States Army is to the effect that, based on the national wealth, the cost of the maintenance of our Army is eight one-hundredths of 1 per cent, while in other nations it is much larger.

The cost, based on the Budget cost of maintaining an army, is 6.27 per cent, while in Italy it is 24 per cent, Japan 13 per cent, France 17 per cent, and England 8 per cent. In addition to that, the testimony reveals a startling fact. We boast about our great power and influence in the world. The testimony shows that we start at the top of the ladder and go down 17 steps before we get to the position of the United States Army as compared with those of the great military powers of the world. Is not that a handsome thing to boast about? We are even behind Japan and China. We are behind Bulgaria, we are behind Spain, a nation that we defeated in 1898, we are trailing in the rear of a military sense until we become the laughingstock of the world. Talk about military preparation and military power! We saw that illustrated just a few months ago in the incident that occurred at Shanghai, when a little island nation, with some 65,000,000 people, with a trained army of one-fifth of the number they met, crushed and demolished the opposition. Why? Because of preparation and trained soldiers, and with all due respect and an unusual amount of charity for my friend the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BROWNING], now the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, I am unwilling to believe that we can take an $1,800 clerk and put him out to play the part of a major general in the leading of an army in the field. I believe in sufficient appropriations to maintain this Army as it is and I am going to stand for that position in this House of Representatives. [Applause.] In other words, we are seeking here to indirectly reorganize the United States Army by an appropriation bill, and perhaps cripple it forever. According to the undisputed evidence the reduction of the personnel at this time will destroy the morale of the Army.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Texas. I yield the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield the gentleman three minutes.

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAY. Yes.

Mr. KETCHAM. In respect to the gentleman's reference to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BROWNING], who now occupies the chair, was he not complaining rather about the fact that generals and captains were taking the places down here in the department that could be filled with $1,800 clerks? He did not say that an $1,800 clerk could occupy the place of a general.

Mr. MAY. I suggest that correction. I think that is the just import of his remarks, but I meant to say that I was not willing to leave that clerk there and retire the trained officer so that we would have to take the clerk in place of a major general when the fight came on. When you undertake by implication to repeal a statute, you can not do it by an appropriation bill, and the effect of this bill is to repeal the national defense act so far as the effectiveness of the Army is concerned.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAY. Yes.

Mr. CELLER. I take it that the Committee on Military Affairs on our side of the House are not in agreement with the members on our side who comprise the majority of the Committee on Appropriations. Am I right in that?

Mr. MAY. I can not speak for the committee. I am speaking as one of its members, but I believe it is generally true of the other members that we are not in favor of this method of eliminating officers of the United States Army. I, at least, think it ought to be done entirely on the merit system.

Mr. CELLER. Does not that present a rather insurmountable difficulty to the other Democrats on this side of the House? We have the sorry spectacle of a cleavage between two groups of Members on our side.

Mr. MAY. I think the gentleman's question would imply that it is in the nature of a political controversy, when as a matter of fact there is no politics in it, because we are dealing with the national defense. I am sure no one on either side of this House would allow politics to influence him in the consideration of questions affecting our national defense.

Mr. CELLER. But there ought to be some sort of unanimity of opinion, it seems to me, on this side which would not put the remaining Members on the Democratic side to any degree of embarrassment when we come to vote on a proposition like that.

Mr. MAY. I think the gentleman is correct in that, but I think it is a question of economy in which we are all interested, and I believe that the method of economy sought here is unwise, that it is in line with the old adage of penny-wise and pound-foolish, with all due respect to the members of the Committee on Appropriations, who by their perseverance and patriotism have shown themselves entitled to the confidence and support of the country.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAY. Yes.

Mr. FINLEY. Would the gentleman weigh paltry dollars against the national defense and the safety and security of our people?

Mr. MAY. Never in the world.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAY. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I think the gentleman very properly answered the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER] when he stated that neither the Committee on Military Affairs nor the Committee on Appropriations ever consider questions of this kind in a partisan way.

Mr. MAY. That is correct.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. If Members differ, they differ because of differences based on individual judgments, but there is no division along party lines, in reference to matters of national defense.

Mr. MAY. None whatever. That is my understanding. Further, I think the Secretary of War and the Chief of Staff of the United States Army are entitled to great weight in their recommendations in these matters, because they are in touch with them and they know about them and we do not. One of the statements of the Chief of Staff, made in connection with eliminating certain proposed appropriations, was "that they were willing to consent to those," and he extended his remarks by saying that if we would not cripple the effectiveness of the man power of the United States Army they would suffer, being placed in any kind of quarters in which we were pleased to put them and live on half rations if they could but maintain their position of patriotism and love of country and their position in the United States Army as professional Army officers.

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAY. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. What he meant was that we would not cripple what little effectiveness there was left in the United States Army?

Mr. MAY. That is it exactly, and he was of the decided opinion that the passage of this bill in its present form would practically destroy it, rather than cripple it.

Mr. ROGERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAY. I yield.

Mr. ROGERS. What the Secretary said was that we must not make the mistake of crippling the man power of the military organization of this country.

Mr. MAY. That is exactly it.

Mr. GILCHRIST. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAY. I yield.

Mr. GILCHRIST. I notice what the gentleman said about following the advice of the generals, that we should not follow carpenters but follow those who are in authority in the Army. I have been thinking about one statement that was made by Gen. Charles E. Bridges, The Adjutant General, who appeared before the subcommittee and being asked the following question:

> Do you not think that in a time of depression like this you could well dispense with this activity for one year, without doing any harm?

He was referring to the citizens' military training camps. He replied, saying:

> I think it might possibly be dispensed with for one year or possibly two years, without any great amount of harm.

In view of what the gentleman has said, what would the gentleman say about following the advice of that expert?

Mr. MAY. I would say in respect to that matter that the Chief of Staff of the United States Army testified before our committee that the future hope of the Nation was in its citizen soldiery, and that a vitally important and effective feature of that training was the Reserve Officers' Training Corps and the Army training camps, and that the elimination of that meant a destruction or weakening of the man power of the United States Army. He said, furthermore, that the maintenance of the training camps in the country meant the elimination of the necessity of keeping all the time a large standing army, and there would be great economy in that direction. I agree with him absolutely. In addition to that the training camps of the country develop the characteristics of patriotism, neatness, system, and everything else among our young men that make them available as great soldiers. [Applause.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL].

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, we have gone rather far afield and discussed many subjects without touching upon the matter before the House at the present time, and I would like to devote just a few minutes to the bill under consideration.

Members who have served here for several years past were all acquainted with our one-time colleague who represented Porto Rico, Hon. Felix Cordova Davila. You all knew him as a courteous gentleman, as a statesman of the old school, tremendously interested in the welfare of the island, and a patriotic citizen of the United States. During his service he introduced on various occasions a bill similar in character to the one under consideration. I think the bill is just, fair, and equitable, but, beyond that, I think it would be a very gracious gesture on the part of the House, in the absence of Mr. Davila, who has been appointed justice of one of the courts in Porto Rico, to pass this bill practically by unanimous vote. His service to his little island and his service to the Nation will thus be recognized by Congress and will undoubtedly be received by him and by the people of Porto Rico not as a gesture but as a bona fide recognition of their patriotism and their desires to perpetuate the traditions of their original race and of their island.

There is one thing about the bill, however, that I do not like. I have always been opposed to writing a preamble to any legislation, and I do not think this in any way, shape, or manner helps the bill. In fact, I think it would be improved if we struck out everything in the bill up to line 1 on page 2, and I hope as one of the members of the committee, the acting chairman will accept as a committee amendment an amendment to strike out in the joint resolution all up to line 1 on page 2. I am sorry to say I was not in the committee when this was reported out. This language that I ask to be stricken out does not add to subtract anything in the legislation; it is not at all necessary, and it is bad practice to write a preamble in a bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Texas. The committee accepts the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LOZIER].

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Chairman, I trust the committee will consider this resolution seriously, although it merely corrects the spelling of the name of one of our insular possessions, generally referred to as "Porto Rico," when the correct name is "Puerto Rico." I do not think that we should treat this proposal with indifference, and we should adopt the correct spelling of this name and abandon the incorrect spelling, which has been used since we acquired that island.

The Committee on Insular Affairs unanimously and favorably reported this bill. Before we acquired this island it was a Spanish possession. It is inhabited by Spanish-speaking people. The name, from a historic and linguistic standpoint, is and always has been "Puerto Rico" and not "Porto Rico." While I am not a linguist, I understand there is no such word in the Spanish language as "porto," but there is a word "puerto," which primarily means "a pass in a mountain." "Porto" is a Latin word, found to a limited extent in the French and in the Italian languages, but more extensively in the Portuguese. "Porto" has never been engrafted into or upon the Spanish language.

In 1493, when Columbus landed on this island, he called it "San Juan Bautista." The natives called it "Borinquen." Since about 1515 it has been customary to refer to the island as "Puerto Rico." I submit that this historic and traditional name should not be abandoned and a name substituted which is entirely foreign to the language of its inhabitants and for the adoption of which there is no historic or other justification.

The Spanish-speaking people who inhabit the island are now loyal American citizens. They are interested in the proper spelling of the name of their island home. There is no reason, either in the history, language, or traditions of these Spanish-speaking people to support the legitimacy of the foreign term "Porto," used in connection with their island habitation. The name "Porto Rico" is an impure, idiomatic compound, partly formed of the foreign word "Porto," of Latin origin, but which has never been adopted into the Spanish language, and which Americans, and particularly the United States Government, have used illegitimately as a substitute for the word "Puerto," which is a genuinely Spanish word, though no reason of diction or advantage of euphony exists to warrant such substitution.

By resolution of the Legislature of Porto Rico (Puerto Rico) passed on May 6, 1930, the United States Congress was petitioned to restore officially to that island its true name of Puerto Rico, in place of Porto Rico as it is now generally called in America. The copy of this resolution was transmitted to President Hoover and to Congress.

We acquired this island from Spain by the treaty of Paris, which was signed in December, 1898. This treaty was written and executed in duplicate originals, one in the English and the other in the Spanish language. I am informed by the State Department that in the English duplicate copy the name of the island is spelled "Porto Rico," while in the Spanish duplicate copy of the treaty the spelling is "Puerto Rico."

The Spanish-speaking American citizens who reside in this island have a sentimental interest in the restoration of the traditional name of the island. Since its discovery it has been known as "Isla de Puerto Rico." If this change is desired by our Spanish-speaking American citizens in the island, I know of no reason why the change in spelling should not be made. I am sure the American people would seriously object to the misspelling of the name of an essentially American city, State, or community. There is no reason why we should abandon the traditional and historic name of this island. I trust that Congress will act favorably upon this bill.

In this connection, I will say that we have never changed the native or geographic name of our insular possessions, the loyal citizens of which I am sure would seriously object to an abandonment of the traditional names of the lands that gave them birth.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOZIER. I yield to my colleague from Washington.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I would like to ask the committee if it has consulted any members of the National Geographic Board, which is a select board that attempts to correct the spelling of the names used in the United States, and Porto Rico, of course, is part of the United States.

Mr. LOZIER. In answering my friend from Washington I will say that no representative of the National Geographic Board or Society appeared before the Committee on Insular Affairs, or approved or disapproved the pending bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. That board rises up in its wrath and objects to names it does not pass on.

Mr. LOZIER. That may be true, and we all recognize that that society performs a very useful service. I am not authorized to speak for that organization, nor do I know their attitude to the pending bill, but that great organization, notwithstanding some peculiarities and idiosyncrasies, stands for accuracy in spelling and accuracy in the use of geographic terms. Among many other useful activities it seeks to discourage departure from accuracy in all things geographic.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MCKEOWN].

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 17 minutes of my time to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. MCKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, I am very grateful to my colleagues for the time they have yielded me. I rise to say a word about this propaganda that has been carried on by the great newspapers relative to the policy of Congress in cutting the salaries of its Members. Before that step was taken, it was featured in big heavy letters on the front pages that Members of Congress refused to cut their own salaries. After Congress cut its salaries we do not even see mention of it on the middle pages of the paper or the back page.

A strange situation exists among the newspapers of this country. The reporters are honest and truthful. They are notoriously honest and truthful. I have never met a reporter yet who would not tell the truth about any conversation or situation he reported. However, the editorial departments of these newspapers are notorious for their loose use of the truth. We hear condemnation of Congress on all sides for what they said would balance the Budget, either by raising taxes or cutting down expenses, and we are ballyhooed about balancing the Budget.

We never had a Budget in this country until 1921. What did they do during the previous hundred years when they did not have a Budget to balance?

A lot of this talk about balancing the Budget is merely bankers' "boloney," because they do not want this Congress to appropriate any money out of the Treasury either to relieve unemployment or the distressed condition of agriculture. [Applause.] That is what is the matter.

When it was discovered that the Budget was so seriously out of balance what was the sane thing to do? It was not to levy an unheard burden of taxes upon the distressed people of this country but was to cut every expense possible and issue a few bonds and levy moderate taxes.

They talk about soaking the rich. Why, there are not many rich to soak. All of us woke up and found that we are financially poorer. Some had more and some had less, but we were all in a bad fix. This is no time to talk about levying a heavy tax burden upon the American people.

When I came into this Congress the first of the session what did I expect and what did you expect? We expected there would be some program here by which the unemployed of this country could be put back to work. We expected a program that would help relieve agriculture, which is now in the slough of poverty.

Why, I saw where ewes were selling in Omaha for 10 cents apiece, and the fattest hogs in the world were selling for $3.50 a hundred. Talk about farmers prospering! I will tell you what has been the matter for the last five years. The Reserve Bank of New York has been putting in its time trying to rehabilitate Europe; and the other day when we passed what is known as the Goldsborough bill to stabilize the dollar and to stabilize price of products in this country, we found the Reserve Bank of New York in telegraphic communication with Paris to keep them buying the American dollar. They were more interested in keeping it up over there.

When we talk about paying the bonus, what do they tell us? The big financiers come here and tell us that if we issue any new money or pay any bonus you are going to take us off the gold standard and we are going to make the foreigners take their gold out of this country. If they have enough money over here to determine the destiny of the American people and affect the finances of this country, the quicker they get it out of here the better off America will be. Let us get it out of here if it is going to have that effect on our country.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Does not the gentleman think it would be a good idea to keep that gold and apply it to our foreign debts?

Mr. McKEOWN. You can not take private foreign money and pay a political debt. I brought in a bill to pay this bonus. I will tell you what it will do. My bill provides a way by which you can bring into the Treasury $1,400,000,000 and at the same time pay the bonus. I say it will do it, and you will bring into the Treasury $1,400,000,000. That will help to balance the Budget and you will pay the soldiers their bonus in cash but you will pay it in circulating bank notes. You can take a $1,000 certificate that has a $500 loan on it. A banker pays in to the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs $500 which the veteran has borrowed. That certificate is taken and deposited in the Treasury of the United States for note-issuing purposes. The banker can then issue on that certificate $500 in note issues and pay the soldier what is owing him, and the bank gets $1,000 in 1945. In that way the soldiers' bonus will be paid and it will put $1,400,000,000 into the Treasury.

The banks will not do any business now because they are afraid, but under my bill you will provide a note issue to all the boys over this country.

What has been done for agriculture? What has been done for the unemployed of this country? What program has been provided for work for the unemployed of this country? Will you go back home and say you could not pay the bonus and that all you did was to balance the Budget and levy taxes that would absolutely break the back of business?

Take the great resources of this country. Why, we are not broke by a long shot. The Treasury of the United States shows that we have $12,000,000,000 of assets in the Treasury of the United States. We owe only $17,000,000,000, or $5,000,000,000 more than assets in the Treasury. Uncle Sam is in the shape of a great number of the bankers of this country. He has a lot of frozen assets. If you will but give him time, he will not be in such bad shape.

You have to give people an opportunity to make money. You have to restore the buying power of this country. When the people of this country realize that the domestic market is the only market they are going to have for the next four or five years, and they trim their sails accordingly, everything will work out all right. Then let the farmer produce his products accordingly, enough for himself at home and let whatever surplus he may have go to the American market. When you do that, you will start the wheels of industry turning; but until you do that, all the laws that Congress can enact will not change the economic situation.

They talk about this inflation of money. The best economists in the country have all contended and maintained for half a century that $1 for every $25 in property is not excessive circulation, and we have not anything like that. We are supposed to have $360,000,000,000 worth of wealth, but that has probably decreased to $300,000,000,000, and we all know we could have a little more money in circulation. They stand up here and tell us that they have our bonds and that our bonds call for payment in so many grains of fine gold, that we have outstanding gold obligation, and we can not change the gold standard.

Let me call your attention to the law of this country. On the statute books of this country there is a law that says the policy of the United States is bimetallism and that a silver dollar shall be as good as gold in this country and abroad to pay debts.

Mr. GLOVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes.

Mr. GLOVER. About two-fifths of the population of the world now is on the gold standard and three-fifths on the silver standard. How in the world would we ever establish the world trade that America must have on a single standard of money and deal with those folks where silver is only worth about 25 cents on the gold standard?

Mr. McKEOWN. That is a very hard proposition, and I doubt if we can do it, but we need not worry about doing any foreign business for the next four or five years. With the present tariff situation there will be none.

Mr. GLOVER. We could do it if we had bimetallism, could we not?

Mr. McKEOWN. I do not know whether we could or not under present circumstances. I am trying to urge the American manufacturer and the American farmer to come to the conclusion that America is the only market they can expect. There is enough market in America to make the Americans prosperous if they have sense enough and courage enough to regulate their sales according to the American market.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. And if other countries are at a very low ebb, it would be reasonable to suppose that they should not be permitted to send their products in here.

Mr. McKEOWN. Absolutely not. Let them keep their products where they belong.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. And the farmers of America ought to have the benefit of their home markets.

Mr. McKEOWN. If the United States has no other market, they certainly ought to keep the home market for their home folks.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Then we would have to have a high tariff to keep foreign products out of this country.

Mr. McKEOWN. We have a high tariff now that is keeping them out.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. How would you keep them out if you did not have a high tariff?

Mr. McKEOWN. But we have a high tariff now that keeps them out. I am talking now about what we can do without bringing any political proposition into it. I could say a whole lot if I were going to talk about the tariff, but what I say now is that Congress is about to adjourn, and there has not been a single, constructive measure passed that has carried a thing down to the little man in this country.

If you pay this soldiers' bonus in new money, it will do more to start a revival of business than anything else. Why was there not a revival of business when the other bonus was paid? Because there was not a single dollar of new money involved, whereas under my proposed plan you would have some new money.

You can not prosper in this country if you borrowed money in 1925 and now have to pay it back at the rate of three dollars for one. If your farmers borrowed money in 1925, when they could pay it with a bushel of wheat at $1, how can they ever hope to pay their debts when it takes 4 bushels of wheat to make $1 and the rates of interest are enormous?

Mr. ARENTZ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes.

Mr. ARENTZ. While the gentleman is on the question of people who have borrowed money, unless something is done by the Congress to help those who borrowed money from the Federal land banks or the joint-stock land banks who can not meet their interest and the amortization of their debt, the gentleman has got to answer for something when he gets home and so have I.

Mr. McKEOWN. I shall not have to answer myself, because I stood here and fought to the last ditch for a moratorium of one year. I did not want any discretionary power and therefore I introduced an amendment to give them a moratorium of one year, and the amendment was lost by a few votes.

Mr. ARENTZ. But many of your people have borrowed money from joint-stock land banks, and there is a bill now before the Banking and Currency Committee, and if something is not done with respect to that bill to help the men who borrowed from the joint-stock land banks, we are all going to have to answer for it.

Mr. McKEOWN. I do not know about the power of Congress to stay execution under certain circumstances, but your judges ought to do like some of our judges in Oklahoma. They have taken the bit in their mouths and have said to these farm-mortgage companies, "You are not going to foreclose these mortgages in my court. You may submit them and I shall take them under advisement while the man has an opportunity to live."

We are letting the Federal land banks sell them out, we are permitting the joint-stock land banks to sell them out, and we are not doing a single thing here to increase the opportunity of such men to pay their debts. The farmers of this country want no alms and ask no charity at anybody's hands. The farmer does not want to borrow any more money. He needs money, but he knows he can not pay it back. What the farmer wants is an opportunity to sell his products for enough money to pay his debts and meet his municipal and State taxes. All this talk about high taxes in a large part of the country is by people who do not pay any direct Federal tax. There are great masses of people who are suffering from their State and local taxes.

Why, they talk about great hordes of lobbyists coming down here to the Congress. There were a lot of poor employees of the Government who came down here and sat in the galleries to see what was going to happen to them.

Now, my friends I do not want to give the money of the United States away, but when Members stand here and say you can not make appropriations to relieve distress in this country, you admit that you can not meet expediencies when they arise in a free government.

This abuse and propaganda is for no other purpose than to scare Members of Congress. When a proposition is made here to appropriate money for unemployment, the papers immediately shout "Look at the condition of the Treasury." Gentlemen, we should look at the condition of the Treasury, but we should have looked at the condition of the Treasury during the years gone by when we appropriated money for that monstrous extravagance, that $14,000,000 bridge over the Potomac River, which should not have cost more than a million and a half.

Look at the magnificent buildings we are building in Washington in a flood of extravagance.

There is a man in this House who has been fighting extravagance for years. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] has been fighting in this House for 12 years against undue extravagance in Government, and I suppose he has saved the salary not only of himself but thousands by his objection to extravagant appropriations. Take my colleague from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN], he has spent many hours in this House not only saving millions to taxpayers but by his expert knowledge of the cotton plant has on more than one occasion saved that great agricultural industry to the people of America. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the Commissioner from the Philippines [Mr. OSIAS].

Mr. OSIAS. Mr. Chairman, prompted by a duty of friendship for the author of the resolution and for the people affected, I crave the indulgence of the committee for two brief minutes.

I take issue with my good friend the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. PARKS] in thinking that this is an insignificant matter growing out of mere sentiment. Never underrate the importance of individual and national sentiment in human affairs. It is sentiment that has made the history of this Republic so rich in traditions and achievements; it is sentiment, individual and national, that carried that starry banner from victory to victory until to-day its shining folds protect the islands of the sea. [Applause.]

The change of the spelling of the name of Porto Rico may seem trivial to some, but to the inhabitants of that island it is fundamental, priceless, all important.

Mr. Chairman, when you approve this measure, House Joint Resolution 149, you are investing in friendship. You do more than that. You are preventing the perpetuation of inaccuracy, both historical and linguistic. Porto Rico is neither good Spanish nor good English, it is not even good American. Puerto Rico is the name used in important documents and writings hoary with age.

Puerto Rico is the name near and dear to the hearts of the people of that island. They petition you to restore and legalize the name they adore. The change is requested by the legislature of that island Territory. That demand was transmitted through the presentation of this House joint resolution by the former Resident Commissioner from Porto Rico, Mr. Davila. It is suppored by the new Commissioner, Mr. PESQUERA, and it has merited the approval of the Committee on Insular Affairs.

I ask that it be approved because we shall be correcting a historical and linguistic inaccuracy, we shall be investing in friendship, and we shall be doing something that will evoke the eternal gratitude of a people to the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the Commissioner from Porto Rico [Mr. PESQUERA].

Mr. PESQUERA. Mr. Chairman, first of all I must say that I feel very proud and greatly honored on this first occasion in which I am to be heard by this high body. I represent a small country, but a country which is a community of one and a half million American citizens. I have heard what the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] and what the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. PARKS] have said about the bill, which only seeks the changing of the word Porto Rico to Puerto Rico, which they consider of no importance whatever. The first little piece of ribbon with which a mother ties the hair of her daughter is a thing of very little importance in and of itself, but for that mother it means everything. It means the traditional love of her child and her sentiment, and it becomes a most distressing event for her if that little piece of ribbon is taken away from her. It constitutes a relic for which the mother would give her life. Puerto Rico is the name we have given to our fair land. Puerto Rico is the word associated with the tombs of our parents and the cradles of our sons. Puerto Rico is the word we have consecrated as representative of our patriotic sentiments. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] said that he would defend by any means the name of his State if anyone would try to change a letter of it. We consider that we were deprived of something of our own, something of our soul, just the same as a mother would feel if she were deprived of that little ribbon, of which I have spoken, as being kept by her in remembrance of her beloved daughter.

I am here because we have faith in the justice of the American people and because we believe in American institutions. We know that this Congress of the United States is not like a man who would take away violently the little piece of ribbon from the hands of the mother. We know that this Congress is not willing to impose itself upon the patriotic feelings of the people of Puerto Rico, and we know that we are going to have the restitution that we are asking for in this bill, which is of no significance whatever to the United States from an economic standpoint but which is of immense significance to the high feelings and patriotic sentiment of one and a half millions of American citizens in the island of Puerto Rico. [Applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I take the time in opposition to this bill because I believe it would be a mistake to change a name that all the children, all the people for years back, have known under that name the island adjoining that of Cuba. Since the gentleman from Missouri spoke I have taken occasion to look up in the dictionary a number of places which bore the name of Porto, not Puerto, and I find 20, but not one which bears the Spanish name "Puerto." I find there Porto Alegre, Porto Bello, Porto Novo, Porto Rico, Porto Royal—all down the line. There are 10 or more. Now, as the gentleman from Arkansas said, it is a mistake for us to try to engraft a Spanish name upon an Anglican name. "Porto" is Anglican for this island, and it has been accepted as such. It would not only cost thousands but hundreds of thousands of dollars to make this change. Throughout this dictionary there is "Porto Rico," "Porto Rican," and others, and all those plates would have to be changed. We would have to change the names on the bonds. Why should we in this particular change a name just because the Legislature of Porto Rico wishes to have a Spanish rather than an American name? For instance, I learned the name "Havana," not "Habana," the Spanish spelling. I learned the name "Constantinople" and not the name "Stamboul" or "Istanboul" or "Byzantine." I know it as "Constantinople." So I might go and cite other instances. We have it established in the minds of the people of this country as "Porto Rico" as the name of the island, and when the bill is read I intend to move to strike out the enacting clause, because I do not think this Congress should be occupied with these insignificant matters.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired. All time has expired.

The Clerk will read the joint resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That from and after the passage of this resolution the island designated "Porto Rico" in the act entitled "An act to provide a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1917, as amended, shall be known and designated as "Puerto Rico." All laws, regulations, and public documents and records of the United States in which such island is designated or referred to under the name of "Porto Rico" shall be held to refer to such island under and by the name of "Puerto Rico."

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do this to ask the gentleman from Texas, or the Commissioner from Porto Rico, as to what evidence there was before the committee that the people of Porto Rico really desire this change? I am quite sure this information would have a great deal of influence with a number of the Members in this House.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Texas. This report contains all that I know about the matter.

Mr. TILSON. Is the Commissioner from Porto Rico certain that he represents the sentiment of his people and the legislative body of Porto Rico in urging this request?

Mr. PESQUERA. In the report is the resolution of the Legislature of Porto Rico.

Mr. TILSON. The report is very brief, and I wondered if the gentleman had any further information that he wished to give the House to assure the membership that this change of name is desired by his people, and that they are willing to incur additional expense, if necessary, in order to change the name?

Mr. PESQUERA. The Legislature of Porto Rico is the representative of the whole people. You can not see any Porto Rican write the name down "Porto Rico" except when addressing somebody in the United States. They all call it "Puerto Rico" down there.

Mr. TILSON. Does the gentleman have any idea as to the actual expense to the government of Porto Rico that will be involved in making this change?

Mr. PESQUERA. I do not think there will be any expense at all, because the change is not going to be made rapidly, but just to declare that the official name is "Puerto Rico." Time will take care of the substitution.

Mr. TILSON. And the Commissioner is certain that in making this request he is making a request that is in line with the sympathy of his people, that they desire it, and that if there is any expense connected with it they are willing to bear it?

Mr. PESQUERA. Yes, sir.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman from Connecticut yield to me?

Mr. TILSON. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. For how many years have they used the present spelling?

Mr. PESQUERA. They use the Spanish word.

Mr. SNELL. But how long have they used it as "Porto"?

Mr. PESQUERA. Ever since a few years after American occupation. As a matter of fact, I have a report here from a brigadier general of the United States who was military governor of Porto Rico, and he called it "Puerto Rico" in his official report in 1899.

Mr. SNELL. What is the occasion of calling it up at this time?

Mr. UNDERHILL. It has been before Congress and before the committee before this. Mr. Davila, who was here for a number of years, urged it strongly before the committee at other times, but it has always been lost in the shuffle. The Committee on Insular Affairs has not had a Calendar Wednesday, in my recollection, in the last 10 years.

Mr. LOZIER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. I yield.

Mr. LOZIER. The gentleman from Connecticut is familiar with the fact that the Porto Rican Legislature petitioned Congress to make this change?

Mr. TILSON. When was that?

Mr. LOZIER. It is shown in the report. It was on the 6th day of May, 1930. May I say, if the gentleman from Connecticut will permit, that the American people have never adopted the practice of changing the historic and linguistic names of any of our dependencies. The names of the Philippine Islands or Hawaii or any of the other islands have not been changed.

Mr. SNELL. We did change this name, did we?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes. They use "Puerto Rico" down there almost universally, and we changed it because it was easier to spell it "Porto."

Mr. STAFFORD. In our school days we always knew it as "Porto Rico." The geographies all have it "Porto Rico."

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I have in my hand a report of Brig. Gen. George W. Davis on the industrial and economic conditions of "Puerto Rico," spelling it as it is provided in the bill. This was issued by the Division of Insular Affairs in the War Department in 1899 and printed at the Government Printing Office in 1900.

Mr. SNELL. It was spelled the way we are spelling it now.

Mr. TILSON. No; it was spelled there the way it is now provided for in this bill. It was spelled in this official report written in 1899 the way it is now desired to have it changed—"Puerto Rico."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. Chairman, the impression is sought to be conveyed that the Anglican term Porto Rico is of recent usage. Every one of us who studied geography 50 or more years ago knows that the island to the east of Cuba was known as Porto Rico.

I cited from Webster's Dictionary name after name having as part of it the word "Porto"—20 or more—every one being of Spanish derivation.

Are we in America going to have a hybrid name, or the Anglican, Americanized name of Porto Rico?

Are we to put the Government and the Porto Ricans to the expense of changing these plates? Are we to put the Government of Porto Rico or the Government of the United States to the expense of changing dies for postage stamps, for their currency, for their bonds, and many other things merely to gratify the sentimental whim of the local inhabitants of Porto Rico who are of Spanish descent and who would like the name spelled the Spanish way rather than the Anglican or American way?

I say it comes with rather ill grace from the erudite gentleman from Missouri. He should study the names I have referred to. The first name is Porto Bello. Then there is Porto Torres, a Spanish Province in Sardinia, spelled "Porto." Then we have Porto Santo, Porto Rico, Porto Novo, Porto Maurizio. So we find that Porto is the accepted spelling, but now by congressional enactment you are going to change the spelling that is accepted everywhere.

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield.

Mr. LOZIER. Is the gentleman serious when he says that postage stamps, bonds, and currency would have to be changed? Does not the gentleman know that when a corporation changes its name, or a city or municipality changes its name, their outstanding obligations do not have to be changed?

Mr. STAFFORD. Those plates are now in existence. When we by congressional action give a new name to this land the dies will have to be changed for all subsequent issues of bonds, postage stamps, and currency.

If there were any basis whatsoever for this change, it would be all right. Why should we make an exception just because persons of Spanish descent would like to have the Spanish name ingrafted upon the American people who use the English language and not the Spanish language?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Every bond issue that is engraved has to have a new plate. Every stamp issue that is printed has to have a new plate.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why should we in America—why should we in the good old United States—adopt a Spanish name as against an American name that has been accepted and taught in the American schools for more than 50 years?

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield farther?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield.

Mr. LOZIER. The gentleman has read the names of a number of places with the prefix "Porto"?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. LOZIER. Will the gentleman tell the House how many "Puertos" are in the dictionary?

Mr. STAFFORD. Not as many.

Mr. LOZIER. If the gentleman will look at them, he will find there are 17.

Mr. STAFFORD. There are not nearly as many.

Mr. LOZIER. There are 17 "Puertos" in the dictionary from which you are quoting.

Mr. STAFFORD. There are not nearly as many "Puertos" as there are "Portos."

Mr. LOZIER. The "Portos" to which the gentleman referred are of Latin or Portuguese origin.

Mr. STAFFORD. They are of Spanish origin.

Mr. LOZIER. There is no such word as "Porto" in the Spanish language.

Mr. STAFFORD. Here is one Porto Grande. There is a Porto Grande in the Cape Verde Islands. There is Porto Bello at Panama, of Spanish derivation, but they have adopted the Anglicized American spelling. [Applause.]

Mr. LOZIER. The gentleman is quoting from Portuguese. The gentleman from Wisconsin, whom we all respect and admire for his sincerity and legislative ability, quoting from the dictionary enumerates a number of places, the names of which have the prefix "Porto." I call his attention to the fact that these are not Spanish names, but largely Portuguese—"Porto Grande" is Portuguese; "Porto Alegre" and "Porto Feliz," both in Brazil, were originally Portuguese settlements, and these names are Portuguese; "Portomaggiore" and "Porto Maurizio" are in Italy, and these names are not Spanish but Italian; "Porto Novo" is not Spanish, but is in British India; "Porto Praya" and "Porto Santo" are in the Cape Verde and Madeira Islands, and are Portuguese. My scholarly friend from Milwaukee can not show that the word "Porto" has ever been ingrafted onto the Spanish language.

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, I shall not take much of your time; but happening to understand something of the Spanish language through 12 years' residence in Old Mexico, I heartily sympathize with this movement. The people of Puerto Rico have a right to the original name of their country, which was only taken from them through a mistake in translating the original treaty of the United States with Spain. It would be just as foolish to compel those people to keep the name Porto Rico, which means nothing at all, as it would be to spell New York with an "a," "Naw York," or to spell Milwaukee with a "u," "Mulewaukee." [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. STAFFORD. The mules come from Little Egypt and Missouri, where they have mule whisky and foul moonshine.

Mr. OSIAS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLER. Yes.

Mr. OSIAS. Is not the word "Rico" Spanish, while "Porto" is not?

Mr. KELLER. Why, surely.

Mr. OSIAS. Therefore, in order that the name shall not continue to be hybrid, the two words "Puerto Rico" should be Spanish; and that is all this bill seeks to accomplish, is it not?

Mr. KELLER. That is exactly the idea.

Mr. FINLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLER. Yes.

Mr. FINLEY. Would it not be as consistent to require the State of Arkansas to pronounce the name of their State the way it is spelled—call it "Arkansas" in place of "Arkansaw"?

Mr. GLOVER. If the gentleman will permit, I will say that an act of the Arkansas Legislature provides that it shall be pronounced that way—"Arkansaw."

Mr. FINLEY. And the Legislature of Porto Rico has petitioned that it shall be spelled "Puerto Rico."

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] that the committee do now rise and report the House joint resolution back to the House with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. STAFFORD) there were—ayes 31, noes 88.

So the motion was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the preamble.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the preamble be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the preamble be stricken out.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the House joint resolution back to the House with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the House joint resolution as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BROWNING, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration House Joint Resolution 149, to correct the spelling of the name of the island of Porto Rico, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that as amended the resolution do pass.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to substitute a similar Senate joint resolution (S. J. Res. 36) with the House amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to substitute Senate Joint Resolution 36 for the pending resolution with the House amendment. Is there objection?

The Clerk read the Senate joint resolution.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the preamble will be stricken out.

There was no objection.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

DISABLED AMERICAN WAR VETERANS

Mr. PARKS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting therein a speech which my colleague, Hon. CLAUDE A. FULLER, delivered last night over the radio at a meeting of the Disabled American War Veterans.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PARKS. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by my colleague, Hon. CLAUDE A. FULLER, at a meeting last night of the Disabled American War Veterans:

Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen and friends of the radio audience, it is appropriate that we should meet on this occasion to do honor to E. Claude Babcock, national commander of the Disabled American Veterans of the World War. Our honored guest, as a law student in George Washington University, volunteered his services in the great world conflict. He was offered and refused a commission, preferring to remain a private. He was a real soldier, the kind that defends and wins victories for his country; as a result he engaged in numerous battles, was wounded, and later honored as national commander of his disabled "buddies."

The veterans of every war, in every nation in the world's history, have been those who made the future history of their country. I never come in contact with one who has worn the uniform in defense of his country, especially one who has been disabled by reason of his service, that I do not feel like doffing my hat in admiration and respect. It is proper that these disabled veterans should organize in order that they might be drawn closer together, with a view of promoting the best interest of the communities in which they live, as well as the welfare of their beloved country. It brings them together as in a family reunion, where they can think and talk of the glories, achievements, and valor of their comrades in days gone by, cooperate, and present a united front to the entire world in the interest of better government. Each of these disabled veterans is a living example of the horrors and misfortunes of war. Regardless of whether they served in the camps or whether they went across, a matter over which they had no control, entitles them to the same honor and respect. The promptitude with which our great Army of over four million was mobilized, their courage and bravery in the Battles of the Marne, St. Mihiel, and Argonne Forest have forever stamped us in the eyes of the world as a brave and liberty-loving Nation. Methinks I can see them to-night as they left homes of loved ones and plenty to die, if need be, for their country's cause.

Methinks I can see them as they were transported 3,000 miles across the briny deep, many in poorly equipped transports, watching and waiting every moment for the approach of a submarine threatening to send them to a watery grave, and at last landing upon the soil of a country, in a climate unusual to many, and among a people whose language they did not know. Although required to do duty in trenches, sometimes in mud shoe deep and in the rain, they never faltered nor became discouraged. When the order was given they courageously went over the top, through no man's land, through barbed-wire entanglements, in the face of liquid fire, poisonous gas, and deadly machine-gun nests, and routed from their trenches the trained forces of a formidable power and forever sealed the doom of the barbaric hordes of Prussianism. By their bravery and loyalty they won the war and taught the Germans that we were not a gold-loving people and afraid to fight after our women and babes had been sent to a watery grave and our flag shot from the masts of our ships. They demonstrated that the spirit which gave to paganism its dazzling luster, to barbarism its redeeming trait, to Christianity its heroic form, and to the American people our liberty, that this spirit was enthroned in the heart of our soldiery and ever present around the firesides of our American homes.

Jew and Gentile, Catholic and Protestant, the rich and the poor fought side by side, shoulder to shoulder, as real "buddies." To these great disabled American veterans, many of whom bared their bosoms to the storm of battle when the heart beat fast and the blood flowed strong, I would that I could strew flowers before them as they march on to the eternal camping ground. May they live long in the land they love and for which they served at the expense of personal disability. May the winter of their age be as green as spring, as full of blossoms as summer, and as generous as autumn. And when at last the fires of life grow low, when at last they shall enter the deepening dusk, after many, many happy years, surrounded by their loved ones with their grandchildren upon their knees, may the memory of their glorious deeds, deeds that tell of heroism, chivalry, and bravery of the flower of American manhood; deeds which will live as long as honesty remains the corner stone of good government and patriotism and loyalty the password of good citizenship; may the memory of these great deeds fill their souls with peace and perfect joy. Centuries hence their achievements will be sung in songs by millions yet unborn, who will lovingly lay flowers upon their honored graves. No greater love has any man than that he is willing to give his life in defense of his country.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a brief memorandum from the Chief of Engineers of the War Department.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, the pending bill making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes, carries a provision on page 72, lines 17 to 22, prohibiting the engineers, while carrying out the works of river and harbor improvements and for flood control, from purchasing any motor-propelled vehicles or launches unless there shall be a specific appropriation for such purpose.

This provision, if it becomes law, will greatly hamper and cripple the Corps of Engineers in carrying out such work. For the general information of Members of the House I insert a communication from Maj. Gen. Lytle Brown, Chief of Engineers, as follows:

The bill making appropriations for military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes provides on page 72, lines 17–22 "Provided further, That no part of any appropriation expended under the supervision of the Chief of Engineers shall be available for the purchase of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles, launches, speed boats or other similar motor-propelled boats unless there shall be a specific appropriation therefor."

The work carried on by appropriations expended under the supervision of the Chief of Engineers includes the maintenance and improvement of authorized river and harbor works, the prosecution of examinations and surveys that have been directed by Congress, the control and supervision of harbor and adjacent waters of New York City, flood control on the Mississippi River and its tributaries, and on the Sacramento River. For the efficient prosecution of this work launches are essential. The work can not be prosecuted without them. They are necessary not only for surveys but are also essential to the service of dredges and other floating plant operated by the department. For work in swift waters and to provide for the speedy transportation of the inspection and supervisory personnel, high-powered speed boats must be provided. The total number of launches, speed boats, and other similar small motor-propelled boats in use by the department is approximately 275. Relatively few of these are high-powered speed boats. Replacements of these boats must be made as required.

The efficient and economical supervision of work spread out over a large area, transportation of survey parties, etc., requires the use of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles. The department does not purchase expensive motor vehicles. The total number of motor vehicles in the department is 295. Their average cost is approximately $750. These vehicles are subjected to hard service in carrying out the work for which they were acquired, and frequent replacement is necessary.

Recognizing the need for the use of motor boats and motor-propelled vehicles in the efficient supervision of the prosecution of the river and harbor work directed by Congress, the river and harbor act of March 4, 1915, provided in section 10 that the prohibition in prior legislation against the purchase of such means of transportation should not be construed as applying to the purchase, maintenance, and repair of motor boats, trucks, and other vehicles needed in carrying out the various projects adopted by Congress for the improvement, preservation, and protection of rivers and harbors.

No reports have reached the Chief of Engineers that the motor cars and motor vehicles procured for the official use of the works have been utilized for pleasure purposes. If any such instances are known to any Member of Congress and are reported to the Chief of Engineers, drastic corrective action will be applied. The proviso incorporated in the act does not prevent the misuse of motor vehicles, but will seriously impair the efficiency of the prosecution of the work.

LYTLE BROWN,
Major General, Chief of Engineers.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a resolution adopted by the Temperance Organization of Live Oak, Fla.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, I object.

ISSUANCE OF BONDS BY THE ST. THOMAS HARBOR BOARD, VIRGIN ISLANDS

Mr. WILLIAMS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 10867) to authorize the issuance of bonds by the St. Thomas Harbor Board, Virgin Islands, for the acquisition or construction of a graving or dry dock.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas calls up a bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LOZIER].

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill which authorizes the issuance of bonds by the St. Thomas Harbor Board, Virgin Islands, for the acquisition or construction of a graving or dry dock. For many years the harbor at St. Thomas had a dry dock, profitably operated by the St. Thomas Harbor Board. St. Thomas is a port of call for many vessels engaged in commerce on the Atlantic, and is in a direct line between London, Liverpool, and the Panama Canal. A number of years ago, in a great hurricane, this dry dock at St. Thomas was demolished. It has not since been reconstructed.

The Governor of the Virgin Islands appeared before the Committee on Insular Affairs and urged the enactment of this bill. This measure has the approval of the Secretary of the Interior. It involves no liability or expense on the part of the Government of the United States, and to satisfy the most technical members an amendment will be offered which, if adopted, will satisfy the most exacting legalistic mind that no financial liability will be incurred by the United States Government under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. THATCHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOZIER. Yes; I yield to my friend from Kentucky.

Mr. THATCHER. At whose expense will it be built?

Mr. LOZIER. At the expense of the St. Thomas Harbor Board. It was shown in the hearings that the revenues from the old dry dock were very handsome, and it is believed that the revenues from the new graving or dry dock will be sufficient to provide an ample sinking fund so as to retire the new bonds at the end of 20 years. I quote from a letter of Secretary Wilbur to Mr. HARE, chairman of the Committee on Insular Affairs:

> The harbor board is an independent branch of the local government of the Virgin Islands. It has its own treasury and is self-supporting from fees collected for certain services. I am of the opinion that no other branch of the Government will become financially involved by the proposed legislation. However, it is suggested that any existing doubt may be removed by the insertion after the word "payable," in line 3, page 2, of the bill the following: "from the treasury of said board."

The cost of the proposed dock is limited to $150,000. It will probably cost not to exceed $100,000. The harbor board expects to use part of the revenue from this dock to make other important improvements in the harbor.

May I say, as I have stated before, the harbor of St. Thomas is in the direct path of commerce between Europe and the Panama Canal. It is the most favorable and desirable port in the Caribbean for dry-docking of boats that are engaged in commerce moving between Europe and the Panama Canal. The harbor of St. Thomas is one of the deepest and finest in the world.

The Committee on Insular Affairs was convinced by the governor and by the recommendations of the Interior Department that this project is feasible, that the income and revenue arising therefrom will be sufficient to maintain the dry dock and to provide an adequate sinking fund for the ultimate redemption of these bonds, and the committee in a unanimous report has recommended that this bill do pass.

Mr. LAMNECK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOZIER. I yield to my friend from Ohio.

Mr. LAMNECK. It may be a contribution to the argument of the gentleman to say that the same board that the gentleman is asking this bond issue for has already demonstrated its ability to handle a proposition like this by paying off the previous bond issue in the amount of $100,000.

Mr. LOZIER. I thank the gentleman from Ohio for his contribution to this subject. The old bonds, issued many years ago, were adequately financed, and the old dry dock produced revenue sufficient to cover all the expenses of operating the dock and to retire the former bond issue. The bonds issued under the pending bill will be the only obligation of the St. Thomas Harbor Board, and it is the thought of the committee that by authorizing this harbor board to issue these bonds we will enable the harbor of St. Thomas to regain much of this dry-dock business that has been lost to that port since the destruction of the old dry dock.

The Clerk read the bill, with the following committee amendment:

> Page 2, line 4, after the word "payable" insert: "from the treasury of said board."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to substitute a similar Senate bill, S. 4193, and for the information of the House I will say that with this amendment the bill is identical with the House bill.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, may I ask the gentleman if this bill in any way will result in a charge on the Public Treasury?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Texas. The amendment takes care of that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to substitute a Senate bill for the House bill, with an amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate bill with the following amendment:

> Amendment offered by Mr. WILLIAMS of Texas: On page 2, in line 3, after the word "payable" insert "from the treasury of said board."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Senate bill, as amended, was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

A similar House bill was laid on the table.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I have no other business from the Committee on Insular Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the committees.

SUSPENSION OF ANNUAL ASSESSMENT WORK ON MINING CLAIMS

Mr. EVANS of Montana (when the Committee on Mines and Mining was called). Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Mines and Mining I call up the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 341) providing for the suspension of annual assessment work on mining claims held by location in the United States and Alaska.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Montana?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the provision of section 2394 of the Revised Statutes of the United States which requires on each mining claim located, and until a patent has been issued therefor, not less than $100 worth of labor to be performed, or improvements aggregating such amount to be made each year, be, and the same is hereby, suspended as to all mining claims in the United States, including Alaska, during the fiscal year from July 1, 1931, to July 1, 1932: Provided, That every claimant of any such mining claim, in order to obtain the benefits of this resolution, shall file or cause to be filed in the office where the location notice or certificate is recorded, on or before July 1, 1932, a notice of his desire to hold said mining claim under this resolution.

With the following committee amendment:

Beginning in line 1, page 2, after "1932," strike out the colon and the remainder of the resolution.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield me a few minutes?

Mr. EVANS of Montana. I yield the gentleman from Wisconsin five minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. The Commissioner of the General Land Office, in which the Secretary of the Interior concurs, recommends an adverse report on this bill, setting forth very specifically that it will be an incentive to absent mine locators to just hold their speculative entries against the business interests of the resident entrymen. I think some explanation should be made to the House controverting the position of the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

Mr. COLTON. I think everyone who has made an investigation of this subject is convinced that practically all the work that can be done for this year has already been done, but owing to the depression and hard times there are a great many poor men who hold these claims who can not do the work.

Mr. STAFFORD. It was difficult, concurring in the position of the Commissioner of the Land Office, to see why the poor man could not perform this little work at a cost of $100.

Mr. COLTON. It is surprising to a great many, but these men, in very many cases, can not get the food and powder and other necessary things in order to do this work. This is in the interest of the poor claimants.

Mr. STAFFORD. From the gentleman's personal acquaintance with this situation the gentleman does not agree with the Commissioner of the General Land Office that this is in the interest of speculative entrymen?

Mr. COLTON. No. It may result in benefit to a few of that kind, but on the whole it is in the interest of the poor claimants.

Mr. STAFFORD. I recall that in the last Congress we passed some bill lifting the requirement of performing this $100 worth of work——

Mr. COLTON. Not last year.

Mr. STAFFORD. In the last Congress.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. No; that bill was passed during the war.

Mr. STAFFORD. It may have been way back during the war that we passed some such bill.

Mr. COLTON. This has been done in other times of emergency.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will not this be taken as a precedent next year?

Mr. COLTON. No; because the western Members heretofore have opposed this kind of legislation.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, with the assurance of the ranking Republican Member that this will not be in the interest of speculative entrymen, I will not oppose the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion by Mr. EVANS of Montana to reconsider the vote whereby the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Mines and Mining have no further business to-day.

AMENDING NATIONAL BANKING ACT AND FEDERAL RESERVE ACT

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I offer the following privileged report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 221 (Rept. No. 1287)

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 11362, a bill to amend the national banking act and the Federal reserve act, and to provide a guaranty fund for depositors in banks.

That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed four hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the Chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment the committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and any amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

The resolution was referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE (H. DOC. NO. 319)

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following message from the President of the United States.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, this being Calendar Wednesday, ought not further business be dispensed with before we consider any other business?

The SPEAKER. Not necessarily.

Mr. STAFFORD. This is holy Wednesday.

Mr. CRISP. Is there any other business under Calendar Wednesday?

Mr. STAFFORD. No.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, to save any question, I move that further business under Calendar Wednesday be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Let the Chair say, however, in connection with this Calendar Wednesday rule, that it does not suspend the Constitution of the United States, which provides that a veto message of the President shall have immediate consideration. The Clerk will read the message.

The Clerk read the message as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

I am returning without my approval H. R. 6662, entitled "An act to amend the tariff act of 1930, and for other purposes."

My first objection to the bill is the misimpression and uncertainty it may convey as to its purpose. If the purpose of the proponents of this act is to secure lower tariffs on the 35 per cent of our imports which are not on the free list, it would seem that the direct and simple method of so doing would be to recognize that tariffs are duties applied to particular commodities, and to propose definite reduction of the duties on such particular commodities as are believed to be at fault and upon which the full facts can be developed. Alternatively, the Congress is able to direct the Tariff Commission under the "flexible" provisions of the act of 1930 to act upon such schedules as are believed to be too high.

As a matter of fact, there never has been a time in the history of the United States when tariff protection was more essential to the welfare of the American people than at present. Prices have declined throughout the world, but to a far greater extent in other countries than in the United States. Manufacturers in foreign countries which have abandoned the gold standard are producing goods and paying for raw materials in depreciated currency. They may ship their goods into the United States with great detriment to the American producer and laborer because of the difference in the value of the money they pay for their raw materials and the money they receive for their finished products. Under such conditions it is imperative that the American protective policy be maintained. If the intent or the effect of the proposed bill is to remove the possibility of Executive action or to reduce tariff protection, there never was a time more inappropriate on account of widespread domestic unemployment and the possibilities which lie before us.

The second objection to the bill is that it practically destroys the "flexible" tariff through the removal of Executive authority to render conclusions of the Tariff Commission effective. This bill would again reduce the Tariff Commission to a purely advisory body to the Congress, and thus defeat a reform so earnestly sought ever since its first advocacy by President Roosevelt and finally fully realized in the tariff act of 1930. By the act of 1930 the principle of a "flexible" tariff based upon determination by a bipartisan commission, subject to approval of the Executive, was firmly and effectively established. Beyond the ability to change the duties by 50 per cent, there lies within the provisions the development of the definite principle of preference of the home market for American industry, workmen, and agriculture, based upon the difference of cost of production at home and abroad plus transportation to the principal markets. This open process, upon the application of any responsible party, is an assurance against either excessive duties or nonprotective tariffs upon dutiable goods.

The broad purpose of the present form of Executive action upon the "flexible" provision is promptly to remedy inequities and injustices in the tariff as they may be discovered; to prevent any tariff system being frozen upon the Nation despite economic shifts, and by providing this flexibility to meet changing economic conditions greatly to lessen the necessity for periodic general revision of the tariff, with its disturbance to economic life and its orgy of politics and logrolling. The "flexible" provision has since the act of 1930 proved its high usefulness in these particulars. The commission has completed or has in progress investigations covering 291 different articles. Of those which come under the "flexible" provisions, the recommendations were for no change in about 54 per cent of the cases, increases in 16 per cent, and decreases in 30 per cent, which were placed in effect within a few days. This effective "flexible" tariff as a protection to sound progress and for the future protection of our farmers, workmen, industries, and consumers should be maintained in our American system. The proposal in the bill under consideration will effectively destroy it and is a step backward.

Under the present law the Congress has the benefit of the advisory functions of the Tariff Commission, upon which it can act at any time. If this bill is to have any practical result by reserving to the Congress incidental or occasional readjustment of the tariff, it simply opens the way for logrolling every time Congress is called upon to consider a report of the Tariff Commission recommending any specific change in rates or schedules. In an effort to avoid this obvious objection, the act attempts to limit Congress, in legislating upon the recommendations of the commission, to the specific items included in the report. But no Congress can bind another Congress in any such manner, relating as it does to a question of legislative procedure.

My third objection to the bill lies in the conditions stipulated for action in an international conference which it is proposed should be called to deal with trade questions. I wish to say at once that I am in fullest accord with the proposal for an international action or conference to "eliminate discriminatory and unfair trade practices," "preventing economic wars," and "promoting fair, equal, and friendly trade and commercial relations among nations." The American Government has participated in several international economic conferences for these identic purposes since the Great War. They have resulted in very little accomplishment.

But the objectives proposed in this bill for such a conference are not limited to the constructive purposes above mentioned. Some of the proposals in the bill for such a conference raise questions of futility or alternatively of abandonment of essential American policies. The first legislative act of Washington's administration was a tariff bill. From that day to this, one of our firm national policies has been that tariffs are solely a domestic question in protection of our own people. It is now proposed that an international conference should be called with a view to "lowering excessive tariffs." The very implication of calling other nations into conference with view to changing our tariff duties is to subject our tariffs to international agreement.

For myself, I hold that any inequalities or excessive duties in the American tariff can be corrected through the flexible provisions of the present tariff law. If other nations should adopt this principle and such an instrumentality, it would automatically remove excessive duties and unequal treatment throughout the world without interference with domestic control of tariff policies.

If the meaning of the Congress is that such a conference should discover and negotiate the elimination of particular excessive duties throughout the world, then I do not need to elaborate upon the direction in which such action leads, for it means simply attempting the futility of negotiating a world tariff amongst 60 or 70 nations subject to confirmation of their legislative bodies. If, on the other hand, what the Congress means is to undertake a general lowering of American tariffs in exchange for lowering of tariffs elsewhere in the world, and if the Congress proposes to make such a radical change in our historic policies by international negotiation affecting the whole of American tariffs, then it is the duty of the Congress to state so frankly and indicate the extent to which it is prepared to go.

I am fully alive to the effect on our own and world commerce of the many arbitrary restrictions now in existence. The Departments of State and Commerce are actively engaged in protecting our export trade from unfair discriminations and infractions. If at any time circumstances are such as to permit the hope that such barriers to international trade and commerce may be removed through the medium of an international conference without sacrificing American interests or departing from the historic policies followed by our country, I shall not hesitate to take the lead in calling such a conference.

If this measure is intended to do more than this, then the new policy should be clearly indicated for clarity to the American people and for the guidance and judgment of the Executive. An established national policy should not be changed by implication.

My fourth objection to the bill lies in the further request that I should "negotiate with foreign governments reciprocal trade agreements under a policy of mutual tariff concessions." This proposal is in direct conflict with the other proposals "to eliminate discriminatory tariffs; prevent economic wars; and promote fair, equal, and friendly trade," all of which latter are desirable.

A firmly established principle of the American tariff policy is the uniform and equal treatment of all nations without preferences, concessions, or discriminations (with the sole exception of certain concessions to Cuba). No reform is required in the United States in this matter, but we should have at once abandoned this principle when we enter upon reciprocal concessions with any other nation. That is at once unequal treatment to all other governments not parties thereto. That is the very breeding ground for trade wars. This type of preferential tariff agreement which exists abroad to-day is one of the primary causes of trade wars between other countries at the present moment.

It has been the policy of our Government for many years to advance "most-favored-nation" treaties with view to extinguishing these very processes, preferences, and trade frictions and to secure equal treatment to us by the other nations in all their tariff and economic arrangements. We have such treaties or Executive agreements with 31 nations. If we adopted this complete reversal of policies and now negotiated reciprocal tariff agreements we should either under our "most-favored-nation" obligations need extend these rights to all nations having such treaties with us, or to denounce such treaties.

The struggle for special privileges by reciprocal agreements abroad has produced not only trade wars but has become the basis of political concessions and alliances which lead to international entanglements of the first order. These very processes are adding instability to the world to-day, and I am unwilling to enter upon any course which would result in the United States being involved in such complexities and such entanglements.

Of high importance to us, also in consideration of these matters, is that the principal interest of a majority of the 60 or 70 other nations which might be approached for mutual tariff concessions would be to reduce the American agricultural tariffs. No concessions otherwise than those related to agricultural products would be of any importance to those particular nations. The effect of such a shift in the basis of our agricultural tariffs would be to make us large importers of food products, to demoralize our agricultural industry, and render us more and more dependent upon foreign countries for food supply; to drive our farmers into the towns and factories, and thus demoralize our whole national economic and social stability.

Moreover, the futility of the Executive negotiating such traties as reciprocal tariffs has been often demonstrated in our past. Before we definitely adopted the policy of equal treatment to all nations, the Congress had from time to time authorized such treaties. Out of some 22 such treaties providing for reciprocal tariff concessions, the Congress either refused to confirm or failed to act in 16, and 2 of the remaining 6 failed of confirmation by other governments. On another occasion the Congress conferred upon the Executive a limited authority to conclude reciprocal or preferential tariffs without confirmation. Twenty-two such agreements were entered upon, all of which were repealed in subsequent tariff acts. The experience would not seem to be encouraging for this type of action.

There are other objections which might well be taken to this bill. It is enough, however, that this bill would destroy the effectiveness of the flexible tariff which, for the first time, gives protection against excessive or inadequate tariffs, prevents a system of frozen tariffs upon the country irrespective of economic change, and gives relief from logrolling and politics in tariff making. It would surrender our own control of an important part of our domestic affairs to the influence of other nations or, alternatively, would lead us into futilities in international negotiations. It would start our country upon the road of a system of preferential tariffs between nations with all the trade wars, international entanglements, etc., which our country has sought to avoid by extending equal treatment to all of them.

HERBERT HOOVER.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
May 11, 1932.

The SPEAKER. The message is ordered spread upon the Journal.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I rise to make a privileged motion. I move that the message be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means and ordered printed. As the matter is debatable, Mr. Speaker, I am entitled to the floor under the motion. I deem it an unnecessary waste of time of the House to have a roll call on this very important bill. The reason I say that is because it will be futile to do so. I am still for the bill, and if there was any chance to pass it, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding, I would make such a motion. The bill passed the House on January 9 with an affirmative vote of 214 and a negative vote of 182. The tariff question is and always will be very largely a political question. It takes a two-thirds vote to pass this bill over the objection of the President. With 182 negative votes on the passage of the bill it is silly to presume that we can get two-thirds to override the veto.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. Perhaps some of your embargo tariff Democrats might obtain a little light from the President's message and want to go on record in favor of sustaining it. Why deny them that opportunity? [Laughter.]

Mr. CRISP. I am not denying them that privilege. Another reason why I deem it unnecessary to move to pass the bill over the President's veto is because every Member of the House is already on record as to how he feels on the bill, having voted either in the affirmative or in the negative. The President's veto does not present any new thought. I am constrained to believe that the President must have read carefully the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD during the consideration of the bill, for practically everything he says in his message was said by those Members of the House who were opposed to it in the debate, and the last part of the President's message seems to me rather to contradict itself. The President, in enumerating different reciprocal trade agreements, did not refer to the one we had with Canada, which resulted in benefit to both countries. Under the bill as passed no American right of sovereignty was affected at all. Anything the international conference did was subject to the approval of Congress.

I am one of those who believe that the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act resulted in injury to the country, resulted in American capital going abroad and establishing branch factories, giving employment to foreigners, and paying taxes to foreign governments instead of their own country.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. In a moment. I may be wrong, but I honestly believe that. I believe the bill further resulted in other countries placing retaliatory tariffs against us, and we are now in the unfortunate situation, resultant from those retaliatory tariffs, that if we at once and alone reduce our tariff rates, without some concession or benefit from foreign countries by their reducing theirs, we might be in a worse fix than ever. Therefore, it seems to me the more logical way is to see if you can get mutual agreements so as to make some of the commerce of the world flow in exchange of products as heretofore. I do not believe anything has contributed more to the economic undoing of the world than these artificial trade barriers. I now yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman has answered my question, because he has made an argument on both sides of the tariff proposition. What I was going to ask the gentleman is this: If he actually believes the statement he made in the earlier part of his remarks, and I suppose he did, why did not the Democratic committee, which is in control of tariff measures in this branch, bring a measure to the floor saying specifically what items they wanted to reduce the tariff on? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. CRISP. It is very easy to answer my friend. My answer may not be satisfactory to him. This Congress has been busy from the day it met, and that is especially true of the Ways and Means Committee, in trying to aid the President in carrying out his reconstruction relief measures, and we have eschewed politics and have passed all of those measures.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. Just wait one moment. I am going to answer the gentleman's question. The gentleman knows, and he is a practical man, that it would have been an idle gesture for us to bring in a tariff bill at this session of Congress reducing specifically certain tariff items, because we are in control of only one branch of Congress, the House of Representatives, and that by a very narrow margin. The Senate is Republican, the Executive is Republican, and we do not believe that we could get any such bill through.

Mr. SNELL. If the gentleman says he kept away from all politics, why did he pass this political gesture that is before us to-day with a veto message?

Mr. CRISP. Because we have denounced on the stump throughout the country the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill. At least I did. I thought we should at least officially, affirmatively, let the country know that we still objected to that bill and condemned that bill, and we had hope that some of the splendid progressive Representatives on the gentleman's side, both in this Chamber and the Senate, would vote for a bill of this character, and we brought it in. Our hopes were realized, for they did vote for it and the bill was passed.

Mr. SNELL. I appreciate the fact that the gentleman has condemned the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill on every stump from the Atlantic to the Pacific; but when you had the power in your own hands to do something definite in way of remedy, you did not have the nerve to do it.]Applause.[

Mr. CRISP. I would say to my friend one of the features of the present law, which the Democrats most severely criticized and objected to when it passed, was Congress surrendering to the Executive the right to make tariffs, under the flexible clause of that act. [Applause.] And we did specifically in this bill take that power away from the President and again confer it where the Constitution placed it—in the House of Representatives. [Applause.]

May I say another thing? There are two very, very substantial and important provisions in the bill as it passed the House that the President did not see fit to refer to in his veto message. One of them was to give the consuming public a representative before the Tariff Commission when they were considering questions of raising or lowering tariffs, to wit, a consumers' counsel, to see that the facts were all brought out.

Another provision, and I consider it one of the highest importance, known as the Norris antimonopoly amendment, was contained in the bill. That simply provided that when any domestic manufacturers created a monopoly, and the Court of Customs Appeals and Patents found that it was a monopoly, the tariff on competitive goods of those manufacturers was to be suspended, and the goods placed on the free list until that monopoly ceased to exist. Clearly that is a very important provision in the interest of the American consuming public. The President, in his veto message, did not even see fit to refer to those two provisions.

Mr. SNELL. He referred to the two most important provisions in the bill.

Mr. CRISP. I think the three most important provisions were taking away from him the right to make tariffs and giving to the public the right to be represented before the Tariff Commission and the antimonopoly provision.

Mr. SNELL. The flexible provision of the tariff bill is always a debatable one, but as far as I am personally concerned that is the best provision in the entire bill and always has been. If the gentleman wanted to go back to the statement made by his own political party leaders, that we should have a scientific way of arriving at a tariff, the only way it can be done is through the Tariff Commission, such as we have at the present time.

Mr. CRISP. I wish I might have some assurance that I would live until the time arrived when a tariff bill would be written without a swarm of lobbyists around here and without logrolling tactics. I think I saw an effort at a logrolling tariff when we were considering the tax bill on the floor of this House. As far as it was possible to prevent logrolling tariffs, which I condemn as strongly as anyone, this bill might have been helpful in that way, for the bill provided that where the Tariff Commission recommended either the raising or lowering of a tariff, that bill could be considered, and it would not be open for the amendment of other schedules.

Of course, I noted what the President said, that one House could not bind another as to the rules. Of course, it can not; and that was argued on the floor of the House when the bill was passed; but each Congress can make its rules. If both branches of Congress made a provision of that kind in a law regularly passed, of course they would make rules consonant with it, and that is the only way that I know of by which logrolling tactics can be prevented.

I now yield to my able and beloved friend, the greatest protectionist in the United States, and he is not sectional in it. He believes in it, and he believes in every section of the country having it, and I have a very great admiration for him, the gentleman from New York. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. CROWTHER. After the gentleman has been so exceedingly gracious, I almost hesitate to ask him this question——

Mr. CRISP. "Lay on, Macduff."

Mr. CROWTHER. The gentleman from Georgia, for whom I have as sincere admiration as he expressed for me, is always eminently fair. He has never made any speeches either against the tariff or in favor of them that he has not printed in the RECORD. He is fair along those lines. [Laughter and applause.] I want to suggest this to the gentleman: The gentleman spoke of the absolute futility of the majority party introducing a bill at this time to change any specific rates that have been complained of. When we had surrendered our majority on this side and when the Senate was Republican, did the gentleman not introduce a tariff bill himself under those circumstances? Did not the gentleman introduce the Fordney-McCumber bill with the industrial rates intact, and added to it the agricultural rates proposed in the Hawley-Smoot bill? I want to ask the gentleman if he did not introduce a bill of that character in the last Congress, when there was less opportunity, according to his contention, of getting action on any such measure than there is now?

Mr. CRISP. I did that, with two other additions, the Norris antimonopoly amendment and the consumers' counsel.

I introduced it to give emphasis to my disapproval of the Smoot-Hawley bill; and I did think possibly though the rates were certainly high, and I thought too high, but better than the higher ones of the Smoot-Hawley bill, we could get enough progressive Republicans in both branches of Congress to join the Democrats and pass it, but my hope proved futile.

Mr. SNELL. Is that all the gentleman was hoping to do, to appeal to the progressives on our side to pass his legislation?

Mr. CROWTHER. I would like to say to the gentleman in answer, if I may be permitted, that I think he did a brave and courageous thing when he introduced that bill. The gentleman had the courage of his convictions; and that bill was much more commendable than this little weasely tariff bill that the gentleman's party brought in this time. [Applause.] Talk about gestures! This was not even a gesture; it was less than that.

Mr. CRISP. I would say to my friend the gentleman from New York that he knows very well my tariff views. I am not and never have been a free trader. I have always believed in a sufficient tariff to equalize the difference in the cost of efficient production at home and abroad. [Applause.] I have repeatedly stated this on the stump in my own district. I have said it on this floor. I have said it in the committee room. I say it again. But I am opposed to unconscionably high tariffs that result in destroying competition and preventing the importation of any goods into the United States. [Applause.]

With the formula I announced, if American industry can not compete on that basis, it should go out of business. On that formula monopolies can not be created to make the American people pay unconscionably high prices for the necessities of life, because on that basis, if they are running the prices too high, goods can come in here from elsewhere and prevent such monopoly. This is my position.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. I yield.

Mr. SCHAFER. If the protective tariff—the Smoot-Hawley tariff—was such a monstrosity that it caused all the ills of the world, why did the gentleman and his Democratic colleagues add the 2¼ per cent to every tariff rate in that bill as well as on many of those imports on the free list under the sales tax reported by his Ways and Means Committee in this session of Congress? Why did the gentleman advocate the embargo tariff on oil? Because his Democratic colleagues wanted it?

Mr. CRISP. That is easy to answer. My friend's questions always sound worse than they really are when you analyze them. [Laughter.]

To start with, I am opposed to any embargo tariff on oil. I am opposed to any tariff on it; but the committee brought in a tax bill and it was a composite tax bill. Politics were forgotten. Republicans and Democrats sat around the table trying to serve their country and trying to bring in a bill to balance the Budget. A provision was put in that bill for a tax of 1 cent a gallon on imported gasoline. That was not an embargo, and it could fairly be argued that it was a revenue producer.

Now, as to the other question, why we put the 2¼ per cent excise tax on imported merchandise whether on the free list or otherwise. There was much opposition to that provision on this side of the House; but when the committee brought in a bill levying a 2¼ per cent manufacturers' excise tax on domestically produced articles to furnish money to the Treasury of the United States to make up a Republican deficit in the Treasury, they thought it would be unconscionable to allow foreign goods to come in here and be sold without paying a like excise tax of 2¼ per cent. [Applause.]

Furthermore, every cent of the 2¼ per cent excise tax paid under that bill went into the Treasury of the United States and not one dollar to any manufacturer. That is why it was in there. [Applause.]

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. We admit that every dollar of revenue goes into the Treasury.

Mr. CRISP. I do not admit that.

Mr. SCHAFER. But if, as the gentleman has stated, a protective tariff is such a monstrosity and affects our trade among the nations of the world, how can the gentleman justify as a matter of principle the levying of the additional tariff of 2¼ per cent?

Mr. CRISP. I do not admit by any means that all the money which the American people are required to pay on account of tariffs goes into the Treasury of the United States. A very small percentage of the goods consumed are imported. Of course, the money collected on goods imported goes into the Treasury of the United States, but three or four times the amount of imported goods are produced in the United States and consumed by the American public. The prices of those goods are increased on account of the tariff, and those increased prices go to the manufacturers and not to the Treasury of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. I appreciate the fact that there are two ways of dealing with the President's veto message; but as this message deals largely with party matters and, as the gentleman says, is more or less of a political message, we on this side would like to have a vote.

Mr. CRISP. That is perfectly satisfactory to me. Does the gentleman desire any time?

Mr. SNELL. No.

Mr. CROWTHER. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. CRISP. I will.

Mr. CROWTHER. Of course, I realize that the gentleman is speaking the exact truth when he says the tariff is purely a political proposition. The gentleman had the courage in the last Congress to present a concrete proposition in the shape of a tariff bill. If we are going to go before the public next fall on this tariff question, why does not the gentleman from Georgia, aided by the wonderful and distinguished Speaker of the House, and the other splendid talent on your side, prepare a Democratic tariff bill with all the rates you have complained of reduced by the Democratic tariff yardstick, introduce it and say to the people of this Nation, "If you elect us next fall this is the kind of a tariff bill we will pass," and let the people know just what kind of a tariff bill they may expect. [Applause.] Would not that be the courageous thing to do?

Mr. CRISP. We are so confident that in the ides of November we will be given a substantial majority in both branches of Congress, and the Executive, that we are waiting until then, and then we will bring in a tariff bill. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I move a reconsideration of the President's veto message and move that the bill become a law, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding, and on that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House on reconsideration agree to pass the bill, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding. As many as are in favor will, as their names are called, answer "yea" and those opposed will answer "nay." The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 178, nays 166, not voting 88, as follows:

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. GRIFFIN, indefinitely, on account of death in his family.

To Mr. JAMES, for to-day, on account of illness.

WASHINGTON WAS THE FIRST PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a statement recently prepared by myself.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, I doubt if the Members of Congress, or the people of America generally, realize the tremendous service that has been rendered by the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission in correcting popular historical fallacies and setting forth for the future the facts in relation to the history of George Washington and his time.

This work of eliminating the false from the true and in setting up unassailable facts of history has been, in a sense, a by-product of the commission's activities, but its importance is becoming more apparent every day.

To those of us who have been laboring in the almost endless research and publication necessary to bring forth an authentic history of George Washington and his time, it has been astonishing to realize the persistence of error. Almost from the day we started our research service, we were confronted constantly with criticisms, denials, and assertions that indicated the general fog, not only in the popular mind but in the minds of many so-called historians, in relation to this period of our history. We were continually meeting these critics and building up a structure of historical facts that could be relied upon and which would stand for all time as the official record.

It is amazing to note the stubbornness with which a certain number of people contend that Washington's Birthday should be observed on the 11th of February instead of February 22. I have already placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a complete statement covering that question and proving beyond any question of doubt that February 22 is the true birthday of George Washington.

Another persistent error is the often repeated assertion that George Washington did not receive a salary as President. By searching the records we have found that George Washington did receive a salary.

Recently another statement has had wide circulation, which declares that one John Hanson was the first President of the United States. We have repeatedly denied this and pointed to historical references to sustain our position. It has remained for the State Department of the United States Government to place its final stamp of authority upon the fact that John Hanson was not the first President of the United States, but that George Washington himself was the first President of the United States.

In order to preserve this statement and to correlate it with other important facts which are of official record, I wish to quote a statement issued by the State Department of the United States, May 9, 1932, which says:

> Probably because of the bicentennial celebration an unusual amount of interest has been aroused in this country as to who was the first President of the United States. The following is a sample of the replies sent by the department to the various inquirers:
>
> "SIR: The receipt is acknowledged of your letter of April 23, 1932, in which you inquire 'Who is considered the first President of the United States?'"
>
> George Washington was the first President of the United States of America. The office of President of the United States of America was created by express words of the Constitution, which says (Art. II, sec. 1): "The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America."
>
> George Washington took the oath of office on April 30, 1789, and having been reelected served until March 3, 1797, as it was then considered that the term of office of a President expired at midnight of March 3, although it is now the settled practice that the term expires on March 4, at noon.
>
> Prior to the Articles of Confederation, which went into force on March 1, 1781, upon the completion of their ratification by the Thirteen States, the Continental Congress chose from time to time presiding officers or "presidents." Of these there were seven chosen prior to March 1, 1781, Samuel Huntington, of Connecticut, being then in office.
>
> Samuel Huntington continued to preside over the session of the Continental Congress then holding until July 10, 1781. He had asked to be relieved of the duties of that office on the ground of ill health and Thomas McKean was elected to succeed him.
>
> By the Articles of Confederation (Article V) the delegates were to meet in Congress on the first Monday of November in every year and (Article IX) "the United States, in Congress assembled, shall have authority * * * to appoint one of their number to preside, provided that no person be allowed to serve in the office of President more than one year in any term of three years."
> On November 5, 1781, the first Monday in November of that year, "Congress proceeded to the election of a President; and the ballots being taken, the Hon. John Hanson was elected." (Journals of the Continental Congress, XXI, 1100.) Thus, under the Articles of the Confederation, John Hanson was appointed to preside and held the "office of President" of "the United States in Congress assembled." John Hanson had six successors elected at various dates from 1782 to 1788.
>
> The names of the various Presidents of the Congress prior to 1789 will be found on page 31 of the Biographical Directory of the American Congress (Government Printing Office, 1928), which is available in many public libraries.
> While John Hanson (and sometimes Thomas McKean) has in various writings been spoken of as the "first President" because of the position which he held under the Articles of Confederation, his office was that of President of the United States in Congress assembled, and was not the office of President of the United States of America.

Not only actually and really but also in the most strict legal sense as well, George Washington was the first President of the United States of America.

There is nothing new in the foregoing statement so far as historical research is concerned. The United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission had ascertained these facts many months ago, but it is reassuring to note the State Department's voluntary statement and to feel that this should, and undoubtedly will, put an effective and permanent quietus upon a silly and unjustifiable historical mistake.

Posterity will owe to the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission a deep debt of gratitude for its studious, earnest, and persistent efforts to clarify authentic history and I am convinced that this general subject is of such paramount importance that the Congress of the United States should in some way continue such activities, not only for the Americans of to-day but for the generations of Americans yet to come.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE OF O'CONNOR v. DISNEY

Mr. GAVAGAN. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Elections No. 2, I present a report on the contested-election case of O'Connor v. Disney.

The Clerk read the report.

The SPEAKER. Referred to the House Calendar and ordered printed.

VOTE ON THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make this statement in justice to some of our colleagues on both sides of the House. It was not intended originally to have a roll call on the passage of the bill, notwithstanding the objections of the President in his veto message. The Speaker had said to some gentlemen that nothing of importance would come up to-day, and therefore these gentlemen had the right to be away. I knew nothing about it. I had talked privately with my friend the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] and had told him that I was going to move to refer the message to the committee without a roll call. The gentlemen present know what took place on the floor of the House. When the gentleman from New York twitted me to put the matter to a roll-call vote, I did so. I simply make this statement in justice to the Speaker, who had made this statement to some of the Members, and also to let the Members know that I was not aware of that statement when I moved to pass the bill, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding.

The SPEAKER. May the Chair state that in discussing this matter with the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL], the Chair suggested to him that a motion would be made by the gentleman from Georgia to send the message to the committee, and the gentleman stated that was entirely agreeable. So the Chair did not anticipate there would be any vote on the message. There were a number of gentlemen who came to me and asked me what we were going to consider for the balance of the day and I stated that we would not consider anything else and therefore they could leave the Chamber, so far as I knew, and could go to their homes. The Chair feels this statement should go into the RECORD so that these gentlemen and their constituents may know that I was the cause of their not being here to answer the roll call.

Mr. SNELL. I did not know I had made any agreement that there would not be a roll call. The Speaker stated to me he thought probably the message would be referred to the committee and I suspected that the Democratic side had the votes and I did not protest. I stated that so far as I was concerned we were here and wanted to vote on the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not going to quarrel with the gentleman about the conversation, but the Chair has a distinct recollection of telling the gentleman we were going to send the message to the committee and that this was satisfactory.

Mr. SNELL. I admit the Speaker told me that.

ADJOURNMENT OVER

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, the leaders on both sides have conferred and there are about 200 Members of the House who desire to participate to-morrow in the celebration in connection with the dedication of the memorial to Gen. George Washington at Alexandria, Va. I therefore ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Friday next at 11 o'clock.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wonder if the gentleman can tell us what will be the order of business on Saturday, whether the War Department appropriation bill will continue to be under consideration or whether we will consider bills on the Private Calendar. There seems to be a difference of opinion among the membership about this.

Mr. CRISP. My friend from Virginia will readily understand that I have no titular position in the House and I do not know.

Mr. WOODRUM. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] is here. Will the gentleman inform the House about the program for Saturday?

Mr. RAINEY. I may say to the gentleman that if we do not get through with consideration of the War Department appropriation bill we will have to go ahead with that bill on Saturday, of course. If we do get through with its consideration, we will consider bills on the Private Calendar, under the new rule.

Mr. DYER. Will there be a night session Friday night?

Mr. RAINEY. I do not know. That will depend upon developments.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, as I understood it, the Speaker stated yesterday he felt we should have the Private Calendar called Saturday, under the new rule. What is the situation now?

The SPEAKER. The Chair stated yesterday that he felt that the Private Calendar should be called some time in the near future. Members who have legislation on that calendar ought to have an opportunity to have it passed where there is no objection. Some time we will have to call the Private Calendar. Just when it will be the Chair does not know. The Chair expressed the hope that to-day, to-morrow, and Friday we could conclude the consideration of the Army bill, but the gentleman from Minnesota, on account of promises made, thought he ought to object to dispensing with Calendar Wednesday. To-morrow a large number of Members wish to attend the services at Alexandria, and the House ought to accommodate them.

Mr. O'CONNOR. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Do I understand that the call of the Private Calendar will be under the new rule relating to the Private Calendar?

The SPEAKER. Unless some other arrangement is made it will have to be called under the new rule. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, I think there are Members of the House who have an earnest desire to consider the Private Calendar, and I think, in view of the fact that the House will stand adjourned to-morrow, that on Friday, at the resumption of the consideration of the Army appropriation bill, the House ought to be willing to stay here until the bill is disposed of, and then the Private Calendar be taken up on Saturday. I suggest to the gentleman from Georgia that he amend his request to incorporate this.

The SPEAKER. It is within the power of the House to stay in session on Friday until it passes the bill if it so desires, even if it takes 24 hours. The gentleman from Georgia is now asking the privilege to adjourn until Friday at 11 o'clock.

Mr. BLANTON. May I ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] if we could not have the Private Calendar to-morrow night, beginning at 8 o'clock? Those of us who work on it—and I am one—are willing to come here to-morrow night and look after it if the Members are willing to hold a night session. [Cries of "No! No!"]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Friday next at 11 a. m.?

Mr. HOWARD. Reserving the right to object. Every Member of Congress has been lambasted all over the country for the failure to accomplish something in behalf of the people of the country generally. I do not like to labor under that castigation, and I therefore feel it my duty to ask the House to remain on duty. I object.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken, and the motion was rejected.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I now move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 a. m. on Friday next.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT

MOTOR TRUCK CLUB OF MASSACHUSETTS (INC.),
Boston, April 28, 1932.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: At a duly called meeting of the board of directors of the Motor Truck Club of Massachusetts (Inc.) held this day it was—

"Resolved, That the Motor Truck Club of Massachusetts desires to be placed on record with the Federal Congress—

"1. We favor the balancing of the Federal Budget—

"(a) By the reduction of public expenditures.

"(b) By the imposition of a manufacturers' sales tax, without exemptions. This will distribute the tax equally to every citizen in the country according to his purchasing capacity.

"2. We are opposed to the immediate payment of $2,000,000,000 to veterans if it causes any form of currency inflation.

"3. We are opposed to special selection for taxation of motor vehicles, tires, accessories, coal, coke, petroleum products, or any other form of taxation which may affect any specific industry."

Respectfully submitted.

DAY BAKER, Executive Secretary.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, also I have received a petition signed by over 1,000 citizens of the State of Massachusetts relative to governmental expenditures and taxation, which I ask may lie on the table and be printed in the RECORD without the signatures.

There being no objection, the petition was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD without the signatures, as follows:

To all Members of Congress from Massachusetts:

The undersigned individual voters demand radically reduced Government expenditures, particularly in payments and pensions to veterans not disabled in actual warfare, and prompt action to balance the Budget through taxation on such a broad, sound, and nonpolitical basis as is offered by the sales tax. Our industries and institutions disintegrate while Congress fiddles. An increase in employment depends on constructive action to create some courage, confidence, and hope in the future. What can we do to help?

REGULATION OF STOCK-EXCHANGE TRANSACTIONS

Mr. KING introduced a bill (S. 4647) to prevent the use of the mails and of telegraph and telephone facilities in furtherance of fraudulent and harmful transactions on stock exchanges, which was read twice by its title.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the purpose of this bill is to prevent the use of the mails and of telegraph and telephone facilities for transmitting information about transactions in securities on stock exchanges, the quotation of prices, and the like, except under certain safeguards for the protection of the public. It is proposed that no such information with respect to securities listed, quoted, or dealt in on any stock exchange be transmitted through the mails or by telegraph or telephone unless the exchange on which the transaction takes place has been incorporated under the laws of the State or Territory in which its business is conducted and unless the charter and by-laws of the exchange, or the laws under which it is incorporated contain certain regulations and prohibitions satisfactory to the Postmaster General with respect to security transactions on the exchange, the character of the securities dealt in, the genuineness of the price quotations of such securities, and with respect to other information concerning such transactions which is to be transmitted either through the mails or by telegraph or telephone beyond the limits of the State or Territory in which the exchange is incorporated.

It is proposed that before the securities of any corporation are listed, quoted, or dealt in on any such exchange the corporation shall file with the secretary of the exchange a statement relating to the property of the corporation, its liabilities and obligations, the volume of its business, and net earnings for a period of at least three years preceding the filing of the statement. A like statement is to be required with respect to every subsidiary of the corporation. Such statement shall also contain information with respect to contracts entered into by the corporation affecting the authorization, issue, sale, or disposition of the securities which are sought to be admitted to the official list of the exchange, and the corporation is also to be required to file with the secretary of the exchange and the Postmaster General detailed statements with respect to agreements entered into between the corporation and its officers and directors and of the salaries, commissions, or other compensation paid to such officers and directors.

It is also provided in the bill that securities once listed on an exchange shall not be removed from the security list of the exchange except after due notice to all security holders.

The manipulation of securities and all fictitious purchases and sales, including "matched orders" and "wash sales," are to be prohibited. Likewise, it is proposed that members of the exchange be forbidden from hypothecating any securities of their customers for any amount in excess of the sum owed to such members, from entering into agreements with customers for such use of their securities, and from lending securities pledged with them.

The regulations are also to contain provisions requiring members of any such exchange to keep accurate accounts of all transactions conducted by them upon the exchange and to keep their books of accounts and records open to inspection by the officers of the exchange and by the Postmaster General.

No member of an exchange is to be permitted to purchase any securities unless he has received from the customer a partial payment of at least 20 per cent of the market price of the securities on the date of purchase. Other prohibitions are imposed upon the sale by an officer or director of a corporation of securities which he does not own.

Appropriate penalties are provided for violation of the provisions of the bill.

It is proposed that the provisions of the bill shall take effect six months after the date of its enactment.

The gambling in securities which has been promoted by stock exchanges and some brokers and investment trusts has been a curse to our country, and is in part responsible for the deplorable conditions now prevailing. If the bill which I have offered is enacted, it will prove an obstacle to future stock gambling and a corrective of stock-exchange methods.

I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The motion was agreed to.

RECOMMITTAL OF A BILL

On motion of Mr. COUZENS, the bill (H. R. 7716) to amend the radio act of 1927, approved February 23, 1927, as amended (U. S. C., Supp. V, title 47, ch. 4), and for other purposes, was recommitted to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

CLERK IN THE DISBURSING OFFICE

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate reported unanimously Senate Resolution 208, and it is on the calendar. I ask unanimous consent that it may be taken up and agreed to.

Mr. McNARY. As I stated last evening, I do not usually consent to taking up business irregularly from the calendar, but this is a pressing matter to meet an emergency situation, and I have no objection to the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 208) was read, considered, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate hereby is authorized and directed to employ a clerk for service in the disbursing office of the Senate at the rate of $2,220 per annum, to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate until otherwise provided by law.

OCEAN MAIL AND SHIPPING ROUTES

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD, as part of my remarks, a compilation of the instances where competition in bidding on mail routes was made impossible under the specifications of the Post Office Department, by Mr. John Nicolson. It gives most valuable information and information that the Senate ought to have. It is compiled by an expert, long familiar with the business of shipping and ocean routes and having had a long experience as an official of the Shipping Board or Fleet Corporation, and it ought to be made a part of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, and it is as follows:

Instances where competition was impossible under the specifications of the Post Office Department in the award of ocean mail contracts

[NOTE.—The data in the tabular statement below have been compiled from the report of the Postmaster General in response to Senate Resolution 85 (S. Doc. 69). Supplemental comments are given at the end.—JOHN NICOLSON. May 9, 1932.]

FURTHER COMMENTS SUPPLEMENTING THE ABOVE STATEMENT

I

COMPETITION WAS EXCLUDED, INTENTIONALLY EXCLUDED, BY SPECIFICATIONS, COMPLIANCE WITH WHICH WAS POSSIBLE BY ONE PERSON ONLY

The monopoly in bidding resulted primarily from the certifications made by the Shipping Board relative to kind, size, and speed of vessels "required" for the postal route involved. The exclusion of all bids other than the preferred line was perfected by two limitations imposed by the Postmaster General, viz: (a) The short time allowed within which to present a bid and (b) the very early date by which the operation of the service was required to commence.

The text of the law made wholly unnecessary the undue speed attending the award of these contracts, for instance: The law provided (sec. 414f) as much as 12 months from June 30, 1928, through which investigations could have been made, wise procedure developed, and reasonable time given prospective bidders to examine and consider the matter within a reasonable time limit for bidding.

The commencement of operations under the contract could also have been fixed to allow prospective bidders time within which to secure necessary equipment, etc., with which to perform. The text reads (sec. 403), "Performance under any such contract shall begin not more than three years after the contract is let * * *," a provision clearly contemplating that an award may be made to a company which may have to build new vessels for performance.

The following is a sample of what in fact was done: The act was approved May 22, 1928. On May 24, two days later, the Post Office Department immediately adopted a group of routes for certification; they were in fact routes which had been previously recommended by the board. On May 29 the board certified the vessels' requirements, in the manner and on the basis we have described.

The advertisements inviting bids were then immediately inserted, viz, on June 9, 1930; they required bids to be presented by July 9, 1930, or within less than 30 days from the first appearance of the publication. More serious than these, however, was the requirement that performance of the contract should commence on August 1, 1930.

This speed seems to have been unjustified from every point of view. Prompt movement of the mails was not involved not only because the new act provided for the extension of the existing contracts for a term not exceeding one additional year but also because, if such contracts were not extended, the steamship services were there and in the absence of any contract, their legal obligation to convey the mails was definite and certain—at the poundage rates.

II

POWERS RESERVED TO CHANGE, BY MUTUAL AGREEMENT, PORTS, ROUTES, AND VESSELS, NULLIFY COMPETITIVE BIDDING, EVEN WHEN THE INITIAL BIDDING WAS COMPETITIVE; OR, DO THE RESERVED POWERS NULLIFY THE CONTRACT?

A transaction is not based on competitive bidding unless the services in fact rendered and paid for, under the awards, are substantially the same services on which the competing but losing bids were also based. The law provides (sec. 406) that in the advertisement inviting bids for the particular route the Postmaster General—

"shall describe the proposed route, the time when such contract will be made, the number of trips a year, the schedule required, the time when the service shall commence, the character of the vessels required, and all other information deemed by the Postmaster General to be necessary to inform prospective bidders as to the character of the service to be required."

The above provision requires that definite specifications be presented, so that definite bids may in turn be submitted; and that all bids shall relate to the same services, viz, the services in fact wanted and in fact to be rendered.

Although the notices advertised were apparently definite in describing a particular route, the vessels to be used, and the number of voyages to be made, the contracts contain provisions that the Postmaster General and the contractor may make basic changes in the services to be rendered and the compensation to be paid, changes which may be equivalent to the abandonment of the original agreement. Among such "reserved powers" in the contract are the following:

(a) They "may extend the service to additional ports, curtail the route to omit ports, change the service to substitute ports, or increase or reduce the number of trips."

(b) Although the contracts provide for the operation, in the first instance, of vessels of specified size and speed, they contain, on the other hand, a provision that if the Postmaster General and the contractor mutually agree that "the needs of the service require it" they may also agree to operate additional vessels and to substitute vessels of higher classes; that is, larger and faster vessels.

Now, if these reserved powers are valid, the requirement for competitive bidding is superfluous. We think the law authorizes no such reservations, and the serious question is presented whether a contract containing such provisions is not voidable at the instance of the Government. They conflict with the following provision of section 410 of the act:

"The Postmaster General may, in case of emergency, permit the substitution for a particular voyage of a vessel not within the provisions of the contract, even though not conforming to the requirements of section 405."

This provision clearly implies and assumes the contract has been written to conform with what the law, as mentioned above, clearly requires, viz, the designation of vessels of size and speed described, and performance of the contract with vessels which were the basis of presumptively competing bids. The provision quoted above is, of course, wise, to meet an emergency.

While in violation of the text quoted above, their legality is subject to challenge on broader principles of law and of common justice—assuming that competitive bidding was in fact intended; indeed, whether intended or not, the fact remains competitive bidding is required.

If these reserved powers are valid, then it would seem the advertised notice could describe and have sole reference to a proposed service from Miami, Fla., to Habana, Cuba, requiring only the comparatively small vessels sufficient for that service, say 2,000 tons. Bids having been received accordingly, and a contract awarded accordingly, but containing these reserved powers, may it then be expanded, by private agreement between the Postmaster General and the contractor, not only without inviting further bids but without notice of any kind, into a contract for a service between New York and Rio Janeiro with great ocean liners, say of 20,000 tons and 20 knots speed, with maximum compensation belonging to that class. The mere statement of the possibilities under such reserved powers reveals the possible illegality of the contract containing them, irrespective of the high motives which may have prompted them.

INCREASE OF BANKING FACILITIES

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, it is my understanding that the Senate is to proceed with the unfinished business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is advised that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE] is to proceed this morning on the unfinished business.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 4412) to provide for the safer and more effective use of the assets of Federal reserve banks and of national banking associations to regulate interbank control, to prevent the undue diversion of funds into speculative operations, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG].

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to discuss the bill as a whole. I desire to confine my remarks to a discussion of the subject of branch banking. I understand the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] applies to that subject. However, I shall discuss primarily branch banking, as I conceive it to be a very dangerous undertaking for America to engage in upon a scale beyond branch banking within a municipality. The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK], the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, has proposed an amendment to strike out section 19, and it is that amendment which I propose to discuss.

Before entering upon a general discussion of branch banking, I want to point out two very material propositions which have not been discussed to any great degree up to this point and one of which has not been touched upon at all. I want to call the attention of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], who is sponsoring this bill, to the fact that if section 19 as proposed shall permit branch banking, then we will be initiating a system which will deprive all local communities, every town, city, and village, wherever there may be established a branch bank, of revenue that now comes from the taxation of banks.

Let me point out that under a branch-banking system only the fixtures in the branch bank and its real estate will be subject to taxation. All taxes upon the assets of the bank, all income taxes, if there be a State system of income taxes, will be made impossible by section 19 as to every locality. I know of cities in my own State having a population of twenty or twenty-five thousand, which, if the branch banking system were in any general degree extended throughout the State, would lose at least from $50,000 to $75,000 a year in taxes that ought to go to those communities. Under the system suggested it is proposed to drain the local communities; it is proposed to suck the financial resources out of those communities, and to deprive them, on the other hand, of the sources of taxation which they now enjoy. I think that is a very serious objection to the enactment of the bill in its present form.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator's contention is based on the proposition that the branch banks will not be taxable by the States?

Mr. BLAINE. No; I base my contention upon the proposition that, under the present laws of the United States and under whatever laws the Congress may hereafter pass, unless they very materially modify the organization of branch banks, the respective communities in which such banks are located will have no power to tax them except as to the fixtures and the real estate of the particular branch bank. The assets of the branch bank, no matter how great they may be or of whatever character they are, will escape all taxation in those local communities, and all taxes of that character will go to the community where the parent bank may be located.

Mr. President, the various subdivisions of government are having a difficult time under present circumstances; they have difficulty under any circumstances, whether in good times or in depression, to find the sources of revenue with which to carry on the undertakings of local government. Let me say, by way of parenthesis, that, after all, practically all the useful and immediate services that come from government are paid for by the local communities. It is our cities and villages and towns and counties that must operate the courts. They must pay for those institutions; they must take care of the poor; they must support the libraries; they must support the schools; they must support the police system; they must support all the local undertakings of government that afford protection to person and property. After all, upon our local communities is placed the burden of providing for the security and protection of our citizens and their property. That is why taxes are high in local communities. The Federal Government contributes very little, on the whole, with respect to the enforcement of law, the protection of property, the promotion of health, education, libraries, or any other service to which the citizens are entitled. In the very nature of things the realm of the Federal Government is with respect to purely national and international affairs; and so the burden of taxation for all of the projects to which I have referred rests upon the localities and the property within those localities. To take away this source of taxation is to deprive them of revenues essential for the protection of life and property and the promotion of health, education, and all the other undertakings in which local communities engage.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I should like to inquire of the Senator if it is his view that a bank with all its branches would be taxable only in the county or municipality in which the parent bank is located?

Mr. BLAINE. That is the only place where the bank owns property outside of the real estate and fixtures of the branch bank.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Bank of Canada, for instance, has branches all over the Dominion. Are we to understand that those branches pay no provincial taxes at all?

Mr. BLAINE. My understanding is that the only tax they pay is the tax upon real estate and fixtures. But, however that may be, I know in my own State under our system of taxation the law provides for an income tax but not for a tax on intangible property. We tax only tangible property, not notes, bonds, shares of stock; all intangible property under the laws of my State is exempt from taxation, and the income tax is substituted in lieu of that source of taxation. So, in my State under our present law the only property of branch banks subject to tax under this bill would be their real estate and fixtures—the physical property actually owned and occupied by the branch banks. That perhaps is true in other States having an income tax, and it is true in every State where intangible property is taxed.

There is another objection which has received no discussion except the assertion by the Senator from Virginia—and it was a very material assertion—in the debate the other day that if the branch-banking system were authorized as proposed by this bill the inevitable result would be that the States would authorize branch banking for the State banks, thereby putting the State banks upon a parity with the banks operated under the National Government. But let me call attention to this very pertinent fact which the Senator did not discuss, namely, that under this bill the parent bank may establish a branch bank outside the boundaries of the State in which it is located.

I want to suggest and seriously call to the attention of the Senate the fact that this is just another step to the final end that branch banking will be permitted in this country, without respect to any territorial area whatever. Assuming, however, that that may not occur—which, in my opinion, is not a valid assumption—under this bill a parent bank may establish branch banks outside of the State where the parent bank is located. It is well known to every lawyer that a State can not authorize its banking institutions to do business beyond its own boundaries. In other words, there is no State in the Union that can authorize a banking institution organized under its laws to go into another State and there engage in the banking business—I mean operate a bank. It has no control over banking institutions in other States. If a bank in any State has connection with a bank in another State, the States where the respective banks are located have exclusive jurisdiction in each case, and therefore it is impossible under our fundamental law to place the States of the Union on a parity with the Federal Government in connection with branch banking. I think that is a very serious objection to the establishment of branch banking as proposed by this bill.

I have pointed out those two circumstances. I think the objections are valid. I have examined this problem very diligently; I know of no answer to the two objections which I have suggested, and I think they alone ought to defeat the proposal contained in this bill and thereby bring about the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK].

Mr. President, the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency has very ably outlined the subject of branch banking. I do not want to repeat what he has said or to engage in any discussion of the very pertinent facts which he has presented. I think I can discuss this subject without trespassing upon the premises which he has set forth.

Before entering upon the general phase of the subject, I want to bring to the attention of the Senate another argument in favor of branch banking to which some reference has been made. It has been stated that a large number of our bank failures have been among the smaller banks of the country. In connection with that subject, it is also pointed out that the number of State banks far exceeds the number of national banks; that the number of State banks that are not members of the Federal reserve system far exceeds the number of member banks in the Federal reserve system. All that may be important, and I think is an answer to the proposition when it is contended that these small banks have been unable to support themselves or to maintain their existence and therefore fail. But this proposition is subject to another analysis, and I think I shall be able to point out by the official record—I think it can be asserted with entire confidence that the record can not be disputed—that our smaller banks and our State banks have come through this depression with a success greater than, or at least equal to, that of the banks in the Federal reserve system.

In discussing this matter the other day, one of the Senators pointed out that in the last 11 years, from 1921 to 1931, both inclusive, the amount of deposits in suspended nonmember banks—and I am going to give just the round figures in order to save time—was $957,000,000 and then in the same breath suggested that the amount of deposits in suspended national banks members of the Federal reserve system was only $439,000,000; but there are other suspended member banks of the Federal reserve system the total deposits in which were $294,000,000.

In order to compare the non-member-bank success and the member-bank success, if we align the two items, the amount of deposits in national banks and in State banks that were members of the Federal reserve system, we find that the total of deposits in those suspended banks during the 11 years was $733,000,000, as compared with $957,000,000 of deposits in the nonmember banks.

But that does not tell all the story. It tells only a portion of the fact. These figures I am taking from the Federal Reserve Bulletin of April, 1932, and therefore they are official. On page 237 of that bulletin we find this fact:

The member banks that were reopened during the 11 years had deposits of $119,000,000. When a bank is reopened or reorganized, the general rule is that the deposits are accounted for to the amount of 100 per cent. There may be a suspension respecting the payment of those deposits; their payments may be, by agreement of the depositors, spread out over a year, two years, or three years; but the amount of deposits in the reopened member banks during the 11 years, which represents 100 per cent of the deposits, in all probability is $119,000,000, while the amount of deposits in the reopened nonmember banks was $344,000,000. Therefore, in order to ascertain the exact status of the member banks and the nonmember banks as to deposits which are subject to discount through liquidation of the closed banks, after deducting the amount of deposits in the reopened banks, we have $614,000,000 in deposits in banks of the Federal reserve system which must go through liquidation. In the case of the nonmember banks, taking into account the $344,000,000 of deposits in the reopened banks, we have only $613,000,000 of deposits in suspended banks that are subject to liquidation, and therefore the depositors subject to a reduction in the amount that may be received upon their deposits.

That record discloses that the nonmember banks, though the failures have been many, at the end of an 11-year period show a record in the saving of depositors equal to the record of the members of the Federal reserve system. So the argument that has been made that there is greater safety for depositors under the Federal reserve system with the branch banking proposed than there is with respect to the independent nonmember banks falls to the ground. The security of deposits in nonmember banks is as great, if not slightly greater, than the security of deposits in the member banks, in which group we find most of the branch banking, group banking, and chain banking.

Now, Mr. President, passing on to the general subject, as the chairman of the committee said, branch banking is a foreign system, perhaps suitable to countries that are small in area and population; but let us contrast that foreign system in its efficiency and its accomplishments with the efficiency and accomplishments of the independent banking system that has prevailed in America.

During the World War there was not a nation in Europe, either among the Allies or any other nation, having a centralized banking system with all the characteristics of branch banking, that was able to sustain even its own domestic credit. That statement can not be successfully challenged. In America, where up to the time of the opening of the World War, branch banking, group banking, and chain banking had not developed, the banking system was able to sustain the domestic credit and the foreign credit. Apply that test to a branch-banking system and at once its weakness appears. When I speak of branch banking I think I can apply that term to the banking systems of Great Britain, France, continental Europe, Canada, and Australia—a centralized system with a parent bank, with member banks or branch banks scattered all over the realms of the respective countries. I think it can be demonstrated that that system has been unable to supply the essential credit for agriculture, industry, and in most instances commerce. I will use but one illustration. That is Canada.

As I recall, Canada has 10 or 11 parent banks. Those parent banks have their branch banks scattered over the Dominion. The first 150 miles just north of the American boundary line, or an area of land 150 miles wide, is comparable with an area 150 miles wide in the United States just south of the boundary line as to fertility, climatic conditions, rainfall, and seasonal variations. It is also comparable respecting commerce, especially the water commerce of the Great Lakes, with greater advantages to commerce on the St. Lawrence River going to Canada.

Canada possesses natural resources, even in coal, second only to the United States, and second or third in the production of gold and silver, as I recall; first with respect to some of the more precious metals; with vast timber areas, accessible, with water transportation, the most ideal system for the lumber industry; with hydroelectric possibilities and industrial possibilities comparable to those of the area in the United States to which I have referred.

I do not say that Canada's agricultural and industrial development has been retarded because of branch banking, but I do say that its agricultural and industrial development has not kept step with the possibilities possessed by Canada, and for the reason that the Canadian banking system has been unable or unwilling, whichever the case may be, to furnish the essential credit and currency for agriculture and industry.

Canada's position with respect to commerce is ideal—commerce that would promote agriculture and industry—so it is not her lack of commerce or facilities for commerce that has retarded the agricultural and industrial development in Canada.

Canada's population has increased but a very small percentage, and I call attention to the fact that Canada has a population made up of nationalities and races almost of the same type and character as are found in the United States; indeed, absolutely of the same type.

Canada's wealth has had a very small percentage of increase. Before the present depression, with a population of less than 10,000,000, Canada had wealth of only $30,000,000,000; and 11 per cent of that wealth was American capital, due to the ability of the American banking system to advance credit and the essential currency for the development of American capital in Canada.

What happens in Canada? There have not been many bank failures there, it is true. But the Canadian branch-banking system has not taken risks. Bank failures do not occur, except in case of criminal defalcation, when no risks are assumed by the banks. We would not have had the number of bank failures we have had in the last few years had it not been for the risks the American banking system assumed. They were not unreasonable risks. The American banking system had a right to assume that farm values were sound, that those values would continue unimpaired. The American banking system had a right to believe that the value of American securities would remain unimpaired. The American banking system took the risk that agriculture and industry would continue prosperous, or in part prosperous. The American banking system advanced credit.

Not so in Canada. The reason why banks do not fail in Canada is that the banks do not assume the risks. The banks do not furnish the essential credit, or any credit to speak of, for agriculture. They do not assume to advance the essential credit for industry.

The experience of Canada has been that, through the branch-banking system, the parent banks have siphoned the wealth and the income from communities all over Canada and left those communities stripped of that to which they were entitled, stripped of their incomes, stripped of the fruits of their labor, and the money carted off to some central bank.

I want to read the expression of an opinion which I think represents generally the situation in Canada, appearing in the Toronto Star, in discussing the Canadian branch-banking system. This is what the Toronto Star said, and this is what the Canadians who live in communities which have been drained of the essential credit to which they are entitled will tell:

Monster banking monopoly, a leech at Canada's throat, killing local industry, depopulating rural districts. Centralization of almost entire financial power of Dominion in the hands of a few capitalists has resulted from our much-vaunted banking system—almost total extermination of local banks.

Under these startling headlines the following article appeared:

While large capital insures slow, steady transmission of deposits to branches for control and use of head offices in smart, alien centers, local credit based on local savings is transferred to parasites, on whom rests neither responsibility, object, nor desire to exercise banking functions in support of local enterprises. With such credit basis lost, not only does the collapse or absorption of local bank institutions become inevitable, but local aspirations and confidence which had sustained local industry are wiped out or made dependent on the will and nod of competitive enterprises. So secretly, so gradually does this sequestration of savings proceed, so insidiously are local enterprises undermined, that planting of a branch to suck out local earnings, to exterpation of even the last local industry or institution is embraced by "slow going" people with the same artless innocence as a 3-year old child fondles a viper. To this accursed system of concentration of credit and destruction of local industry, the Dominion of Canada stands indebted for a contracted population of 7,000,000 in place of 25,000,000 rightfully due it under decentralized systems of banks designated to sustain, to breathe the breath of economic life through the remotest, as well as the most insulated of its parts.

Mr. President, that opinion, expressed by a Canadian, ought to be convincing of the fact that a branch-banking system will slowly, gradually, wipe out independent local banks, siphon the income from the localities, and centralize the power of credit in the hands of a few institutions in the larger centers.

I want to read some extracts from letters which were published by the American Bankers' Association Journal in 1929 with reference to the Canadian branch banking system. These letters point out how credit is denied, how local initiative is chloroformed. As we all understand, under a branch-banking system, the branch bank is not the proud creature of a community. It has not developed out of the ingenuity and the honesty and the integrity of a local citizen who has served his community for on to half a century.

There being no local board of directors, there is no one having a great pride in an institution like the board of directors of an independent banking system would have, proud of their honesty, proud of their integrity, proud of their opportunity to serve their community.

Unit banking lifts the banking business to a plane where the bank becomes a local institution to which the entire community points with pride. It inspires the confidence of friends and neighbors in the officers and the board of directors, the men who have operated the bank. The patrons of the bank feel that there is a sympathetic attitude on the part of the officers toward local institutions. No matter what may be the financial trouble of a local citizen, whether he is engaged in farming or in commercial business or in industrial business, he feels a perfect freedom to go to the office of the bank and there sit down and discuss the financial circumstances of the individual or the institution which he represents, knowing full well the local interest and the local desire to protect that interest.

The whole scheme of independent banking, therefore, is to develop the respective communities and diversify the industries of the Nation. That is impossible under a branch-banking system. We have no diversification under a branch-banking system. In the case of the farmer, for instance, who may want to borrow $300, when he goes to a branch bank or chain bank, or whatever the centralized system may be, he is not treated as a human being. He is given a questionnaire and pen and ink and he must make out a schedule of his property holdings. That is not considered by the branch bank. That is forwarded to the central bank 100 or 200 miles away, whose officers know nothing of the personal integrity and honesty and capacity of the individual who desires to borrow the $300. They know nothing of the honesty and integrity and capacity of the individual to pay, which is of far greater importance than the mere fact he may possess property double the amount of the loan. The far-distant institution knows nothing of the relationship of the individual to the community and his responsibility as an individual. He must wait for days and weeks before he can obtain a loan. It is identically the same with respect to the development of industry, though on a larger scale.

Let us see what the American Bankers' Association Journal found in Canada. They reproduced these letters in November, 1929. The first is dated January 18, 1918, and reads as follows:

It has been decided that it is to the advantage of the institution, and also it will be of great assistance if, until further notice, all applications for loans exceeding $300 be submitted to the directors through the head office for their approval.

That letter was sent out by a parent bank to its branches in the Dominion of Canada, and yet some one has had the temerity to testify before some congressional committee, as I recall, that $2,500 is the minimum limit ever placed on a branch manager. The fact is that the minimum limit is even less than $300 in cases where the branch manager has the right to pass upon the application and grant the loan.

Another letter dated July 5, 1918, is from a parent bank to one of its branches in Canada:

After taking everything into consideration it has been decided that the wisest thing to do is to ask the managers not to make any more loans, except very small ones, say, from $50 to $75, without first sending the application to the head office.

Another letter of July 10, 1918, from a parent bank to a branch bank in Canada:

I realize that a great many of the farmers do need $50 to $75 to buy what coal they would stock at this time of the year, and it is not expected that you loan even this amount unless they are entitled to it without question. Unless we get more rain the condition as to the crop situation is not bright and, although it is disagreeable to refuse people credit which ordinarily we should be glad to grant, still the good of the community is best served by keeping people from borrowing money under such conditions.

Yes; the best interest of the community is served by permitting the farmers to freeze to death! The letter closes with this statement:

It is surprising how little money a man can get along with when he has to.

If that is not a cold, cruel method of determining the question of extending credit to an individual, I do not know what is cold and cruel and heartless. That is exactly the branch-banking system—cold, heartless, cruel, indifferent, because it is an alien system, an absentee landlord.

Is the Canadian banking system a success? It is a success in having few bank failures and it is a success in extending practically no credit. If that kind of banking system is a success, then no banking system could acquire a greater success.

There is very little statistical information as to bank failures in Canada, but they have failures there just the same. We have found that one bank, under the branch-banking plan, in 1923 had 68 branch banks. The parent bank failed and dragged down with it the 68 branch banks. Of course there are failures in Canada. At an earlier date another parent bank crashed and with it crashed its 10 branch banks. Another one crashed and with it went down 27 branch banks.

Mr. President, that is the evidence, and it seems to me it can not be successfully disputed or controverted.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LOGAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. On that question it often occurs, I know, that a misunderstanding goes out as to the bank failures when speaking of Canada, because when it is said that only so many banks have failed, it means parent banks. It seems to me it would be fairer if we counted each branch bank as a bank, because each branch bank performs the functions of a bank in a community. I would like to have the figures based on that sort of calculation. If we should count each branch bank as a bank, how many failures would it make in Canada?

Mr. BLAINE. I have not the information. I would ask the attention of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], if I may have it?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The attention of the Senator from Virginia is requested.

Mr. GLASS. Very well.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator from Nebraska has asked if there might be made available the number of branch banks that went down with the parent banks in Canada. I do not know whether the Senator from Virginia has had that information presented to him or not.

Mr. GLASS. No; I have not. I stated yesterday that I was chiefly interested in the aggregate of losses by depositors by reason of bank failures in Canada in contrast to the volume of losses to depositors in this country. I may add, as stated yesterday, that we are not proposing to transfer the branch-banking system of Canada to the United States. That is a system which covers the entire Dominion of Canada. We are proposing to confine branch banking in this country within the limits of each State.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not want the Senator from Virginia, the Senator from Wisconsin, or any other Senator to get the idea that I asked my question in any spirit of hostility. I remember the figures which the Senator from Virginia gave; they were very illuminating and, I think, very important. Nevertheless, it seemed to me that it would add to the picture if for the purpose of counting bank failures we considered each branch bank a bank. Otherwise, when we speak of so many bank failures in Canada and so many bank failures in the United States we get a misapprehension, because the failure of a bank in Canada means the failure of what would be equivalent to a good many banks in this country, dependent upon the number of branch banks the parent bank owned and operated.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, that observation would apply to the failure of banks in this country which have branches.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes, indeed, it would.

Mr. GLASS. As I understand, there are 10 or 12 States which permit state-wide branch banking. There is an additional number of States which permit to a limited degree branch banking. For example, the Bank of the United States, which never should have been permitted to take that name because it was not a bank of the United States—the very title produced a false impression that it was a national bank—had a very large number of branches in New York, so that what the Senator suggests would apply also in this country.

Mr. BLAINE. I desire to ask the Senator from Virginia a question. I may be mistaken, but my information, I think, is fairly reliable. I am sure the Senator from Virginia, with his candor and frankness, will be able to tell me whether or not the information I have is reliable. As the Senator from Virginia knows, the subcommittee of the Committee on Banking and Currency, of which the Senator from Virginia was chairman——

Mr. GLASS. And I did not desire to be.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator performed the duty, however, whether or not it was compatible with his desire. My information is that the subcommittee had information from the comptroller's office which, perhaps necessarily, was not brought to the attention of the full committee, that the comptroller presented to the subcommittee quite a full statement respecting bank failures in Canada, with a great deal of data which the Senator was not privileged to make public. I am going to inquire whether or not the Senator's committee had access to that information?

Mr. GLASS. I will say to the Senator that he is totally misinformed. The Comptroller of the Currency furnished us no such information. I may make the broad statement that the Comptroller of the Currency did not furnish the subcommittee one bit of information, and not up to this day has he ever commented upon the provisions of the pending bill to the subcommittee.

Mr. BLAINE. I assume, then, that there is not entire harmony in the comptroller's office, and I was very anxious to get the Senator's statement as to that, because I would accept his statement as being correct.

Mr. GLASS. I can not undertake to say anything about the harmony in the comptroller's office. I know what has happened in and before the subcommittee, and we were furnished with nothing of the kind.

Mr. BLAINE. I am quite content to accept the Senator's statement about it.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. LONG. If I may attract the attention of the Senator from Virginia, the comptroller has very definitely gone on record in favor of the branch-banking system.

Mr. GLASS. Undoubtedly, and in a very much more extended way than this bill provides.

Mr. LONG. And he has used in support of the effort to compel branch banking over the United States the example of a bank that during late years has practically exhausted the resources of a State in order to keep open. I have personal knowledge of this matter. The present comptroller's policy is and has been to bring about a branch-banking concentrated system. Without making matters too public, I can point out that the greatest of disasters has come from the enforced branch-banking system, low or no law, that has been foisted on this country by the present comptroller. Whether there is any law for it or not, it is in effect.

Mr. GLASS. The only information I have from the comptroller's office is the information contained in his annual report to the Congress and the information he furnished us at our public hearings. No other information has been furnished the subcommittee from the comptroller's office.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, in connection with the inquiry made by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], let me say unless we have a comparison of the assets of the Canadian banks with the assets of American banks we do not get any adequate conception of the vastness of the American system. The Canadian banks on December 31, 1931, had resources to the amount of $2,997,000,000, as compared with resources of $71,000,000,000 of the banks under the American banking system.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield further to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. I just want to inject again right there that the Senator is speaking upon the assumption that this bill is proposing to introduce the Canadian banking system in this country, which is far from the fact.

Mr. BLAINE. That is the Senator's present opinion, but the Senator will not control this tendency. This is a step in the direction of a complete centralized banking system. The Canadian banking system as to population, as to assets, as to deposits is incomparable with the banking systems in States like New York, Illinois, Ohio, or Pennsylvania. This bill will set up a system that will be permitted in every State in the Union.

Mr. GLASS. While we are engaged in comparisons, suppose we compare the aggregate losses in the entire Canadian banking system with the aggregate losses, say, of the banks in New York, with a less population than Canada. The losses in Canada over a period of 65 years are inconsequential compared to the losses in New York last year.

Mr. BLAINE. I can reply to the Senator that the extension of credit by the New York banks so far exceeds the extension of credit by the Canadian banks that the Senator's contention does not argue very strongly in favor of a branch-banking system. Canada has not extended credit under its branch-banking system as has New York. New York under its system has extended credit and it has taken the risks involved. As I remarked a few moments ago, the banks of Canada have not taken the risks, and if a bank does not take the risks, of course, its losses will be small; in fact, they ought to be nothing if they carry their denial of credit to the *n*th degree.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] placed in the RECORD some weeks ago an article respecting the Canadian banking system. That article, which was written by Mr. M. Grattan O'Leary, is found on page 5629 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I quote from it, as follows:

CANADA'S BANKING SYSTEM

By M. Grattan O'Leary

OTTAWA, March 5.—According to reports of the Federal Reserve Board the years 1931–2 saw 3,635 United States banks suspend operations, with a net loss to depositors of $2,404,000,000. In the light of these disastrous consequences, United States readers may be interested in the operations of Canadian banks during the same years. The Canadian banking story, summed up briefly, is this:

1. Not a single Canadian bank has closed its doors since the beginning of the depression.

2. Since confederation, a period of 65 years, there have been but 26 Canadian bank failures, with a total loss to depositors of less than $13,500,000.

3. Since 1900 there have been but 9 failures, 5 of these being but small banks carrying deposits of less than $1,000,000; and in 5 of the 9 failures depositors did not lose a dollar.

4. During the present depression not a single Canadian bank has even reduced the rate of its dividend; all of them, without exception, have added to their reserves.

What is the explanation? How comes it that while United States banks have been failing by the thousand, and United States depositors losing up to billions, the people of Canada, living under similar economic conditions, have continued to enjoy banking safety, mobility of funds, a reasonable abundance of credit?

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I do not know how authoritative those figures are, but the Canadian year book discloses that in 1923 one parent bank, with 68 branches, closed with a deposit liability of $18,000,000. Let me call attention to the pertinent fact that the Government of Canada feels a definite liability for bank deposits.

Branch banking, Mr. President, involves other considerations. Much has been said about the capital stock of the parent bank, and that whenever a branch bank is established the parent bank must add to its capital stock an amount equal to that which would be required for a national bank if it were organized independently. That argument implies that bigness and volume mean strength. The probabilities are that bigness and volume mean weakness instead of strength, at least, there is some persuasive evidence that bigness and volume do not mean strength in banking. I want to point out some of that evidence.

In California, in 1931, one parent bank with eight branches crashed, with deposits of $7,799,000.

In Maryland a parent bank with 11 branches crashed, with deposits of $13,000,000.

In Ohio a parent bank with 11 branches crashed, with $25,000,000 deposits; a parent bank with 6 branches crashed, with $15,000,000 deposits; a parent bank with 10 branches crashed with $20,000,000 deposits.

In Pennsylvania a parent bank with seven branches crashed, with $5,000,000 deposits.

In South Carolina a parent bank with nine branches crashed, with deposits of $1,000,000. Another parent bank in South Carolina with 40 branches, as I recall, if not more—however, that was a chain system—crashed. The testimony on that subject was given in executive session of the committee during the consideration of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill. I do not recall the amount of deposits involved.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. PRESIDENT——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. BLAINE. I do.

Mr. GLASS. Nothing in the figures presented by the Senator would indicate the size of those parent banks. The figures that really bear upon the Senator's proposition are contained in the report of the comptroller, from which I quoted here on the floor several days ago. That shows that 90 per cent of the bank failures in this country were of banks with an inconsequential capitalization, and that but one-tenth of 1 per cent of the banks with a capitalization exceeding $1,000,000 failed.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, the Senator was not present in the Chamber when I pointed out that those figures are not significant, in my opinion; and I desire to repeat briefly what I said in the absence of the Senator.

I am quoting from the Federal Reserve Bulletin of April, 1932, using round numbers. This has to do with the State banks, the nonmember banks, and the member banks of the Federal reserve system. The Senator quoted some the figures yesterday or the day before during his remarks.

For the 11 years, 1921 to 1931, both inclusive, the total deposits in suspended nonmember banks were $957,000,000. The total deposits in suspended member banks for the same period were $733,000,000. There is, however, this significant fact to take into consideration in that connection:

Some of these banks were reopened. In nearly every case, and in every case in my State, both State and national, that has come to my attention, wherever the bank was reopened there was not a single dollar of loss to the depositors. They received 100 cents on the dollar. The payment of those deposits might be deferred a year or two or three years, but there was no loss on the deposits.

Within the 11 years, 1921 to 1931, in the case of the member banks, those deposits in the reopened banks amounted to $119,000,000. In the case of the nonmember banks, those deposits amounted to $344,000,000. In other words, that left $614,000,000 of deposits in the closed member banks that were in process of liquidation, and $613,000,000 deposits—slightly less—in the nonmember banks that were in the process of liquidation. I think that destroys any significance respecting the percentages which the Senator has discussed. In other words, with the nonmember banks scattered all over the United States serving agriculture, with agriculture taking its deflation away back in 1920, notwithstanding the depression, the nonmember banks came through the 11-year period with deposits in failed banks that are now in the process of liquidation slightly less than in the case of member banks of the Federal reserve system.

I think that is a test that should be applied in considering whether or not bigness and volume have anything to do with strength in the banking business.

I have pointed out failures under the branch-banking system; and in the case of the branch systems to which I have called attention there were only a few where the branch operated outside of the municipal limits in which the parent bank had its situs.

Now, I desire to call attention to another very significant fact in connection with this question of bigness and in connection with the efficiency in administration of large banking groups.

Advocates here in the Senate of a branch-banking system have contended, or will contend, that branch banking means better administration, more intelligent administration, more efficient administration; that all of that superior intelligence and efficiency is available to the large groups, and, being available to the parent bank, of course, is available to the subordinate unit of those parent banks to a far greater extent than is possible for the small banks. That is the way the argument of the advocates of branch banking runs.

Let us look into this proposition.

I am informed by a responsible officer in a department of our Government that there comes to him the fact that American bankers have made loans to Ivar Kreuger, the Swedish match king, running into the tens of millions of dollars; and these loans were made upon Mr. Kreuger's personal statement, without documentary evidence, exactly as loans were made to Mr. Kreuger by the Swedish banks.

I find in the Washington Star a dispatch from Stockholm of May 9 on the Swedish banking system and the Kreuger crash. I will read that article:

Bitter criticism of the Riksbank (Swedish Central Bank) for the manner in which it granted credits of 146,000,000 crowns (about $26,280,000 at current exchange) to the late Ivar Kreuger between February, 1931, and March, 1932, is contained in a report of the permanent banking commission of the Riksdag to the Swedish Parliament.

The report reveals that on four occasions the Riksbank saved Kreuger from suspending payments. It is particularly sharp in criticizing the bank chief for acting beyond his authority and for not launching a thorough investigation into Kreuger's financial position when the first giant credit of 74,400,000 crowns (about $13,392,000) was advanced to him in April, 1931.

"The granting of these credits naturally involved a marked decrease in our country's liquid capital resources and was largely responsible for creating a dear money situation, from which commerce and internal production now suffer," the report states.

"This bleeding of Swedish capital taxed the Riksbank's foreign-exchange reserve; and the Riksbank's failure, after granting the loan last April, to protect its position by an immediate foreign-exchange loan may be regarded as a major factor in forcing our country to leave the gold standard."

The Riksbank's dealings with Kreuger were of large proportions. In February, 1931, Kreuger and the leaders of three Swedish banks approached the Riksbank and requested rediscount facilities to the extent of 32,000,000 crowns (about $5,760,000), which Kreuger stated were to be used for the Polish monopoly.

The Skandinaviska Kreditaktiebolaget (Scandinavian credit company) subsequently received 20,000,000 crowns (about $3,600,000) from the Riksbank, which Kreuger said he could have repaid before the year's end but which were never repaid.

These intelligent administrators, these efficient administrators; are looking for profit and when their special interest is profit, that does not make for safe, sound banking.

There is no guaranty in the system that those who control the branch banks will administer the system with care and scrutiny; but, rather, as the evidence points out, they will administer for the purpose of obtaining profits. The branch-banking system offers no special security, as I think I have abundantly proven from the record that has been disclosed here this afternoon.

Mr. President, I have endeavored to point out two very serious objections to the branch-banking provisions of the bill aside from the general objections to branch banking, namely, that under the bill the community, the town, the city, the village—wherever a branch bank is established—will not be able to levy any taxes upon the assets of that bank if the State has an income tax or in any State where intangible property is assessed, except upon the fixtures and the real estate occupied by the bank if it owns such property. Second, that States will never be able to meet through any State law a national system of branch banking; that the State has no constitutional power to authorize and control banking beyond its own borders; that the State which undertook to authorize and control branch banking as a part of its system beyond its own borders would find itself in difficulties; that the States in which State branch banks are established would supersede the control of the States that undertook to promote their organization beyond its boundary.

I think it has been demonstrated that branch banking has been a failure in the United States respecting the question of losses to depositors. When a parent bank fails, it carries down with it all its branches. Branch banking does not assure security to depositors nor does membership in the Federal reserve system give any greater assurance to depositors than the independent banks.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I understood the Senator, when he began his discussion this morning, to indicate that his contention is that the local communities in which the branch banks are established would be unable to get any revenue by taxing the income of banks, but later I gathered that the position of the Senator is that the State would not have the power to tax the income of the bank at all.

Mr. BLAINE. It is my opinion that under the present Federal law the State can not apply the income tax to the income of a national bank——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am surprised.

Mr. BLAINE. Unless it applies the income tax to all the institutions that are in similar business.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. In competition with the bank?

Mr. BLAINE. Yes; and that is practically impossible. We attempted that in Wisconsin and failed. It proved to be practically impossible to impose an income tax upon the incomes of national banks.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That difficulty, then, apparently exists now as well as it would if the pending bill were enacted into law.

Mr. BLAINE. It exists now, it is true, to a certain extent.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. How would we increase the difficulty?

Mr. BLAINE. To the extent that branch banks, as the bill clearly contemplates, would eventually crowd out the State banks and we would have no banking resources in the community other than the branch banks. However, there is a bill pending that would change the situation to which I have referred, but I doubt very much the possibility of passing that bill.

Under the present law a State that has an income tax finds it quite impossible to assess an income tax against the income of a national bank. The State may assess a tax against the income of stockholders, but in the case of branch banks the stockholders of the parent bank are usually residents of the community where the parent bank is located. Whatever taxes are assessed outside of the taxes on the fixtures and real estate are going to the community where the parent bank is located. The local community will be deprived of that source of revenue.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. LOGAN. I understand the Senator to contend that if there should be an assessment against the shares, that the State could not reach the shares because they would be owned by the parent bank. But if the branch banks are confined to the State, and the parent bank must have branches only within the State, then the shares could be reached; could they not?

Mr. BLAINE. Let me answer in this way. Presently a State that assesses intangible property—notes, bonds, mortgages, stocks—can assess the bank stock in the locality wherever the owner of the bank stock resides. That is the rule. Assuming that in a State there is a branch-banking system set up, the parent bank would be in one community—that is, in the larger center. There are no stockholders in the branch bank. There would be no intangible property to tax, and all that could be taxed would be the fixtures and the real estate.

Mr. LOGAN. That would be true with regard to local taxation, but not State taxation.

Mr. BLAINE. Local taxation, after all, constitutes the larger portion of the taxes.

Mr. LOGAN. But is it not generally true that the intangible property is exempt from local taxation and subject only to State taxation?

Mr. BLAINE. That depends on the State. In our State we have adopted the income-tax system and thereby exempted intangibles from taxation. But very few States have adopted the income tax along the line that Wisconsin has adopted it. At any rate, the tax is not levied against a branch bank, in a State that taxes intangibles, upon the intangible property of that bank. It would be levied in the centralized communities, the large cities. That is what I am complaining of. We are going to drive sources of revenue out of the communities throughout the respective States wherever that situation obtains.

Mr. President, I desire to close my remarks by reading a letter which was written to the distinguished Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. I am not privileged to disclose the authorship of the letter, but the original letter is in the possession of the Senator from Virginia. It is dated May 5, 1932. I want to say that it comes from a man who is deeply interested in a proper banking system, who has had experience, who has been a leader in the banking organizations of the country and in the banking organizations of my own State. He is not a lobbyist. I doubt if he has written to a single Member of Congress asking support or defeat of the bill, other than this letter, written to the chairman of the subcommittee. The words that he has uttered through the letter are entitled to be recorded as a part of the debate upon the bill because of the broad knowledge and wide experience that the author of the letter has had. Writing to Senator GLASS, he said:

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have refrained from writing you during these weeks of discussion regarding the bill which bears your name, in the hope that many of the provisions which State bankers all over the country feel are too drastically revolutionary and too destructive and unfair would be changed or eliminated before the bill got anywhere near serious consideration by Congress. However, as a State banker (president of an institution recording 85 years of continuous banking existence and having nearly 50 years of banking experience myself), I have studied thoroughly and with great concern the provisions of the various drafts of the Glass bill.

It is unnecessary, I know, to recall to your mind my close connection with, sincere belief in, and work for the Federal reserve system during the war as it pertained to securing memberships from the State banks of the country. That friendship for the system continues to the present. I am entirely in sympathy with any measure that will help the Federal authorities to bring about reasonable control of credit through the Federal reserve system, so that improper and speculative practices may not be permitted. But, as a representative of the American State banker, who is a decided believer in the dual system of banking and in maintaining equalities between the systems in order that there might be fair competition, I can not reconcile that section of the bill which permits branch banking to national banks in States where State banks are prohibited such rights. My belief in the whole question of branch banking is, I know, representative of a large group of State bankers—that is, that branch banking tends to monopoly which is destructive of democratic organization and society. I have been willing, however, to modify my tolerance, though not my belief, on this question to the extent of metropolitan-area-wide and county-area-wide branch banking; but that should be for national banks only in States where the privilege is granted to State banks.

I should like to point out further, though I realize that you yourself are fully aware of it, the fallacy in the argument that bank failures throughout this economic depression could have been decreased or eliminated through the branch banking system. A great many banks have gotten into trouble, and the majority of them have been unit banks, because most of the banks in the United States still are unit banks, and many small unit banks, you will agree, should not have been chartered by either the State or the Federal Government, yet I believe statistics would show that a large proportion of the total deposits affected, and other potentially disastrous situations which have hovered over us, were in institutions presently organized along branch-banking lines.

The devastating unfairness to our State-border banks by the adjoining States' national banks crossing State lines, or to State banks in States where national banks may have branches, though the law does not permit that privilege to State banks, would result practically in the elimination of State banks.

I sincerely believe, dear Senator, that your continuous defense of State rights inherent in our type of government, your sense of fairness, and your belief in the need of preserving our American democracy by fighting everything that tends toward monopoly will induce you to strike from the bill these provisions.

During the delivery of Mr. BLAINE's remarks the following occurred:

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. Contrasting the statement which has just been made by the Senator from Wisconsin with the way the banks are operating with reference to the stockmen and smaller merchants throughout my State, I made the statement on the floor of the Senate here yesterday that the branch banks of Montana were not meeting the needs of the people out there. A representative of the branch banks complains bitterly because of the statements I have made, and I want to call the Senator's attention to the statement, and I would like also to have the attention of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT].

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Connecticut give his attention?

Mr. WHEELER. I would like to have the attention of the Senator from Connecticut to this, because of the interest he has taken in the Refinance Corporation legislation, in the Glass-Steagall bill, and because of what the Senator from Connecticut felt that these several measures would do to help the farmers of this country.

I have in my hand a letter from one of the leading citizens of one of the communities in my State. He is not only interested in farming but in stock raising and in merchandising. He says:

SIR: I have just read your speech introducing a bill for relief of farmers. I wish to congratulate you on this truth you have spoken. I am a farmer, and a conservative estimate of my financial standing would be around $75,000 or possibly $80,000. I do not owe a cent to anyone. I own 3,560 acres of land, 500 head of sheep, 175 head of cattle. I had occasion to make application to our local banks here last week for a small loan of $200, and was refused by both banks.

I am not sure that both of those banks are chain banks, but one of them is a chain bank, and I am inclined to think that both of them are.

I am in a fair way (in fact see no other outcome) than that I will lose my entire property from being unable to pay my taxes in future.

This condition does not exist with me individually, but is the universal condition of all farmers and stock raisers in this vicinity. Banks are absolutely inoperative so far as this community is concerned, and charge us a fee for all checks cashed.

We are at our wits' end, and this condition is fast making bolshevists out of our community.

Notwithstanding the fact that we passed the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill, notwithstanding the fact that we passed the Glass-Steagall bill, notwithstanding the fact that every single piece of legislation the bankers of the country and the administration have come here asking has been passed, these chain banks—and I make the statement without fear of contradiction—which are now here knocking at the doors, with their lobbyists, asking for this bill, absolutely refuse to make loans.

This correspondent says they will make no loans not only to himself, he being worth $75,000 or $80,000, that they not only refuse to make him a loan of $200, but he says that is not personal with him, that it applies to every person in that community, practically. Yet we talk about chain banks, we talk about branch banks, and are told how much stronger and how much better they will be able to serve the community if we pass this bill and make more branch banks possible when there is a man worth $75,000 or $80,000 and who does not owe a 5-cent piece who can not borrow $200.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield to me?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator's constituent ought to get relief from the Federal land bank. I quite agree that the banks have no excuse for not accommodating their customers, none in the world, but the Federal land bank would certainly be able to help that man.

Mr. WHEELER. Let me say to the Senator from Florida that the Federal land banks likewise are not making any loans in that community. The people there can not borrow any money from them. As a matter of fact, speaking of the Federal land bank, I know that in my own State substantial farmers who went out and paid, I think, $15 to $25 apiece to have their land appraised by the Farm Land Board, were not able to get loans, notwithstanding the fact that they had ample security. The banks turned them down cold, though they were among the most substantial stockmen and farmers in their localities.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, we appropriated $125,000,000 to add to the capital of the Federal land bank for the very purpose of enabling it to extend its operations.

Mr. WHEELER. If the Senator from Wisconsin will permit me further, let me say that the other day the President of the United States criticized the Congress of the United States, and the criticism was carried generally from one end of this country to the other. He criticized the Congress because of the fact, as he intimated, that Congress would not do what he wanted them to do. If there is any criticism to be justly leveled at the Congress of the United States, it is because of the fact that they have followed blindly this administration, and we followed them blindly on both sides of the aisle. We followed them and passed every single piece of legislation, practically, that the administration wanted, and we have done it blindly.

When they came here and wanted the moratorium passed, Congress passed it for them. When they came here and wanted the $125,000,000 appropriation, or whatever the amount was, for the Federal land bank, we passed that for them. When they came here and wanted $2,000,000,000 for a Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and said, "Unless you pass that piece of legislation, all the banks and insurance companies in the country are going to the dogs," we passed it for them. When the administration was here asking for the Glass-Steagall bill, both the Democrats and the Republicans joined and passed it for them. Every single solitary piece of legislation they have asked for they have gotten. Yet the President of the United States had the audacity to criticize the Congress of the United States because of the fact, as he intimated, that they were not going to pass the kind of a tax bill he wanted. The inference was that the administration favored, possibly, the sales tax, although Mr. Mills, in a statement issued, stated that they were not in favor of the sales tax.

If there is any criticism to be made of the Congress of the United States, it is not for not following the President, not for not doing what the President wanted us to do, but we are to be criticized and should be criticized because of the fact that we followed the executive branch of this Government too blindly, that we passed legislation to help the banks, that we passed legislation to help the railroads, that we passed legislation to help everybody excepting the people whom it is necessary to pass legislation for if prosperity is to be brought back to this country.

I apologize to the Senator from Wisconsin for taking so much of his time.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I did not intend to digress from my discussion of the pending amendment, but I want to say, in connection with what the Senator from Montana has said, that I am not one of those on this side of the aisle who voted for any of the measures to which the Senator refers. I pointed out at the time the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill was before the Senate that it was simply another method of pyramiding debts, compounding interest, when the agricultural and commercial industries of the country were already burdened with debts which the people never could expect to pay. There is not, nor will there be, sufficient human energy out of which will come payments of something like $194,000,000,000 of public and private bonds, mortgages, and other debts. So I for one want the RECORD to show very clearly at this point that I am not responsible for the legislation that has been put through the Congress under the whip and lash of the President of the United States, who said that if those acts were passed, then we would immediately start an upward turn out of the depression.

I understand that even now there is hatching, through some conference committee or through some nonpartisan combination, a scheme to bring forth another batch of proposed legislation, and to drive that legislation through the Congress under the lash and the whip of the administration. The fact is that these proposals do not go to the fundamental difficulties which confront the United States to-day, and until we face the problem in all its realities there is going to be no solution. We can not expect to come out of this depression, with this $194,000,000,000 of debt, during the lifetime of any Senator here or within the period of the next two generations through the palliatives proposed by the administration.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. GEORGE. I do not want to interrupt the Senator's statement, but I wanted to insert in the RECORD, either at the conclusion of the Senator's speech or in the body of it, if he has no objection, a statement with reference to the policy pursued by the Federal land banks to which the Senator from Montana referred. I want to read just one sentence, omitting the name of the local association through which, of course, the Federal land bank must make loans:

> The association was advised by this bank—

That is to say, the Federal land bank in the district to which reference is made—

> The association was advised by this bank that it would not be in position to consider applications for loans through it until such time as all past-due items due it by borrowers through that association had been paid, all past-due taxes on property mortgaged to it by borrowers through that association had been paid by the owners of the property, and—

I direct attention particularly to this:

> And purchasers for the real estate acquired by it in connection with the foreclosure of loans made through that association had been found.

In other words, under this rule of the Federal land bank there is hardly an association, certainly not one in the four Southeastern States, which would be able to submit any loan to those banks and have it approved, because the association would not be able to comply with any such rigid and unreasonable requirements.

Not only is that true, but I now read from a letter of a gentleman well known to me, formerly connected with the Federal land bank, in which he uses this language:

> The land bank—

Referring to the district, which I will omit—

> The land bank will not permit the organization of new associations when they will not allow the old associations to make loans to farmers who would be eligible under the law as it is at present.

They will not permit the organization of new local associations. They will not take an application for a new loan through an existing association until that association has found a purchaser for every piece of foreclosed land which originally passed into the possession of the land bank through the particular association. In a case comparable to the case cited by the Senator from Montana, a farmer with comparable assets and without debt finds himself utterly unable to procure a loan through the Federal land bank.

After the conclusion of Mr. BLAINE's speech,

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] as modified.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I want to make for the RECORD a brief explanation of the pending amendment, inasmuch as it is the amendment which I have offered.

If we are to have branch banking at all, I submit that there should be a self-serving restriction such as this amendment carries. The amendment speaks for itself when read, and I now quote it. It is proposed to insert, on page 45, line 8, after the period, the following:

> Except in a city, town, or village where there is no national or State bank regularly transacting customary banking business, no such association shall establish a branch except by taking over an existing unit bank or an affiliate of such association.

This amendment, Mr. President, supplements my colloquy of a few days ago with the distinguished junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], who has reported the bill on behalf of the committee. It is intended to foreclose branch banking, if permitted under the terms of the bill, from the possible chance to make competitive raids upon community banking. In other words, it is a protective delimitation upon the expansion of branch banking and central banking in competition with community or unit banking in the event that the former be licensed in the national system.

Undoubtedly, Mr. President, the amendment is in entire harmony with the theory of the bill itself, because the bill as submitted provides in subsection (c) of section 19, on page 44:

> A national banking association may, with the approval of the Federal Reserve Board, establish and operate new branches—

And so forth.

I emphasize the fact that no single branch could be established under this authority except by the approval of the Federal Reserve Board. What would the Federal Reserve Board want to know if it were being solicited for permission to establish one of these branches? The Senator from Virginia himself answered that question the other day. It would certainly want to know, chiefly, whether existing banking facilities in the particular community were adequate. If the Federal Reserve Board found that existing facilities were adequate, it is to be presumed that any application for a branch banking permit would be denied. No other rule could justify itself.

This amendment, then, simply intends to translate and warrant this practice in the law. It is, in other words, to make it certain that in any community where adequate national or State banking now exists on an independent basis there can not be a competitive and destructive invasion by branch banking under the authority proposed by this bill.

Mr. President, speaking very frankly, I find myself in great sympathy with the fundamental philosophy submitted by the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE] in respect to this whole subject. I have been one of those, and still am, who feel that the perservation of decentralized community life is absolutely essential to the preservation of the traditional American community character. I feel, furthermore, that decentralized community life is impossible without a practical degree of decentralized commercial and banking independence. Therefore, I have always felt that a general system of branch banking held within it a substantial degree of menace to the fundamental and traditional philosophy which is responsible for the essential American community character.

But we confront a condition and not a theory to-day, and, even in defense of decentralized community life, situations readily may arise in which limited branch banking might be the only community salvation. Certainly it would not protect decentralized community welfare, Mr. President, to close the door on a banking facility which might prove to be the community's only way of saving the solvency of its banking resources. Branch banking might be this sole available facility. Neither does it protect decentralized community welfare by closing the door on a banking facility which may be the only such facility available after all other banking facilities have failed or been withdrawn. Indeed, it might well be argued that under certain circumstances a recourse to limited branch banking may well prove to be means of keeping alive many a decentralized community which otherwise might disintegrate through its very inability to secure any banking facilities whatsoever. It is only in line with that philosophy, Mr. President, that I have been able to bring myself into harmony with the theory that under existing circumstances limited branch-banking permission might well be authorized in the United States. Indeed, I am persuaded that it has come to be necessary to provide this limited recourse under proper protective restrictions. It is the creation of one more optional emergency reliance for the benefit of communities and bank depositors and bank borrowers. I believe my amendment adequately protects the option against exploitation.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. BULKLEY. I rise to say, as a member of the subcommittee, that the statement of the Senator from Michigan is entirely in harmony with the views of the subcommittee. His amendment, as he has said, would in practice probably work out just about the same as the committee thought section 19 of the bill would work out under the administration of the Federal Reserve Board; but, in view of the fact that many small-town bankers are very much afraid that they would be injured by potential competition in the form of branch banks, it would undoubtedly be well to adopt the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan and thus give them statutory assurance that such competition could not be made possible by the provisions of this bill. I sincerely hope the amendment of the Senator from Michigan may be adopted.

I may add, too, that I am authorized to say that the Senator from Virginia is in accord with the view I have expressed.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I thank the able Senator for his observation, and with it I am entirely content to submit the amendment to a vote of the Senate. I conclude simply by saying that it seems to me the amendment forecloses at least 75 per cent of any conjured hazard with which it might otherwise be implemented; and while it still leaves the full opportunity for recourse to branch banking in emergent situations which might perhaps be treated in no other way, yet it creates that statutory protection, as the Senator from Ohio has indicated, which is necessary by way of reassurance against the use of this intended emergency privilege as a means to a competitive raid upon the independent community-banking resources of the State and national systems of the country. I submit the amendment to the Senate on the basis indicated. I shall subsequently support other amendments to this section of the bill.

Mr. LONG obtained the floor.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir.

Mr. GEORGE. I suggest the absence of a quorum, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield for that purpose?

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir; I yield.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Austin	Fletcher	Kendrick	Sheppard

Mr. FESS. I desire to announce that the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], and the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON] are attending a meeting of the Committee on Appropriations; and that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER] and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] are attending a meeting of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have been requested to announce that the junior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING] is detained on official business at a meeting of the subcommittee of the Committee on Manufactures.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-four Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] has the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. LONG. Yes; I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I should like to develop, if I may, whether there are other Senators, and if so, how many, who desire to speak on this bill, in order that I may attempt to get an agreement to vote.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. LONG. I do.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator from Virginia stated on yesterday his purpose to address himself to the particular features of the bill. I dare say that when he does so that will give rise to some considerable discussion. I am particularly interested myself in the provision for the liquidation corporation. I am astonished to find that there is a provision there that the Government must contribute $125,000,000 to the capital stock of that corporation, apparently not in the form of a loan, but a contribution out of the Treasury. It seemed to me a rather startling thing, and I should like to have some rather detailed explanation of that feature of the bill.

Mr. GLASS, Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana, and other Senators addressed the Chair.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I do not want to yield for a general discussion. I understood that I had the floor, and I yielded to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. GLASS. I just wanted to respond to the inquiry of the Senator from Montana.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia wishes to ascertain whether other Senators desire to speak. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield for that purpose?

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir; that is all.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, in that connection I wish to give notice that while I do not expect to make any extended speech, I do desire to enter my objection against section 19 of the bill, and probably to consume not over 5 or 10 minutes in discussing it. That is as much time as I shall desire to speak.

Mr. METCALF. Mr. President, I have some four or five amendments that I believe would improve the bill, and it will take me some little time to explain them.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I expect to speak on the bill for probably half an hour.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

Mr. LONG. It becomes rather evident that this matter is not going to be settled very easily; so I am going to suggest to the Senator from Virginia that he pursue it no further.

Mr. GLASS. I will not pursue it further than to say, in response to what the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] has said, that I have no desire to make any further extended remarks on the bill; but as each provision shall be reached I shall very willingly expound it from the point of view of the committee.

Then I desire to say, with the permission of the Senator from Louisiana, that if there is going to be further prolonged discussion of the bill I certainly want to know it. I do not want to waste the time of the Senate, or my time, or the little physical force that I have left, in a futile way.

It has been suggested that after this afternoon this bill may be supplanted by the tax bill. If that is going to be done, I want to know it. Can the senior Senator from Indiana give me any information bearing upon that point?

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield for that purpose?

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir; I yield.

Mr. WATSON. Because of the overwhelming importance of the tax legislation, for which not only Congress but the whole country is waiting, it was thought desirable that the Senator from Virginia should be conceded this day without question for the consideration of the measure which is now pending in the Senate.

I will say to my friend, because he knows that I am in favor of the bill, that it has developed, I think, on both sides of the Senate that there will be prolonged discussion of his measure. There was no desire to supplant the Senator's bill to-day, first, because of its importance—and it is an important measure, as everyone concedes—and secondly, because of the Senator's very great personal interest in it; and we all bow to his wisdom on this subject.

It has developed, however, that there will be prolonged discussion on the question. I know of a number of Senators who intend to speak besides those who have served notice to-day that they want to discuss this matter.

The Senator from Rhode Island has just served notice that he has a number of amendments he desires to present and to discuss. The Senator from Virginia will not lose any time, in my judgment, by yielding to the taxation proposition to-morrow; and if he would consult me about it, I would advise him to do that.

Mr. GLASS. I would like to ask the Senator something as to the nature of the proceeding. Would it be proposed to lay the pending bill aside temporarily for the tax bill, and at the conclusion of the consideration of the tax bill to take up the pending bill again?

Mr. WATSON. That is my understanding, that the pending bill would be temporarily laid aside, in order that we might take up the tax bill, the consideration of the pending bill to be resumed at the conclusion of the consideration of the tax bill. Of course, if the Senator should afterwards yield for the consideration of other pressing measures, that would be a different proposition, but so far as is now disclosed, the tax bill is the only measure of overwhelming importance before the country and before the Senate, and I would advise the Senator from Virginia that he accede to the proposition to lay the pending bill aside temporarily for the consideration of the tax bill.

Mr. GLASS. I am never in the habit of going up against a buzz saw. [Laughter.]

Mr. WATSON. I know the Senator is in that frame of mind, because we have discussed the matter privately and personally, and he is in a very fine frame of mind about it, I am happy to say.

I want to be entirely confidential with the Senate, and say, in the first place, because of our admiration for the Senator from Virginia and the marvelous work he has done in connection with the pending measure, that nobody desired to supplant his bill even to-day with the tax bill. Then there was the further fact that the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], who is the ranking minority member on the Finance Committee, was unable to be present to-day because of an affliction but expects to be present to-morrow, when it would be entirely appropriate to take up the tax bill for consideration.

Now, if the Senator from Louisiana will yield just a moment longer——

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. WATSON. I want to say one more thing while I have the floor. Every day a number of Senators are asking me, as they are asking other Senators and talking among themselves, as to whether or not it will be possible for us to adjourn this session of the Congress on the 10th of June. It seems that there is an overwhelming desire to adjourn at that time; but, Senators, that can not be done unless Senators are willing to "buck up" to it and make the sacrifice that is essential in order to accomplish that purpose. In other words, beginning with the consideration of the tax bill, or at least on Monday night—every Senator having notice served on him in time—we should begin to hold night sessions. The Senate should be in continuous session from 12 o'clock noon until 10 o'clock at night for the purpose of considering the tax bill. If we follow that course, we may be able to get through by the 10th of June. If we do not follow that course, we shall not be able to adjourn by that date.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WATSON. I yield, with the permission of the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. WHEELER. Does the Senator include in the program to be voted on at this session of Congress legislation for the relief of the unemployed and likewise legislation to help the farmers in the deplorable situation in which they are?

Mr. WATSON. I am not able to say about farm relief, I may say to my friend from Montana, but as to unemployment relief I am sure that provision will be made for its ample consideration.

Mr. WHEELER. Let me say to the Senator that I do not feel that we ought to adjourn this session of the Congress and go home until something is done to assist in the refinancing of the farmers of this country in some way. I have called attention to it on the floor of the Senate, and the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry is considering legislation along that line. There is such a deplorable situation that something should be done before the session ends.

We have passed reconstruction bills to help all kinds of industry, but the biggest industry of the country nothing has been done to help refinance, and I think something should be done.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I have no desire now to outline the program of future action of the Senate, because that is up to the Senate itself, but I do know that as to the tax bill, and as to the unemployment situation, and as to the question of the reduction of public expenditures, on which a subcommittee is now working, ample time must be given for the consideration of these questions. I personally know that no Senator desires that the session shall adjourn before the really worth-while measures have been provided for and taken care of. Of course, everybody believes that.

We have passed, and there has been signed, but one appropriation bill. Ten others are yet pending and, of course, they must be passed, because everyone recognizes the absolute necessity of passing all the appropriation bills before the end of the fiscal year; else we shall be compelled to pass continuing resolutions to provide for the activities of the Government not appropriated for, or the Government will be compelled to suspend such operations. So, that in view of all these things, it is a question of the vigilance and the diligence of the Senate as to whether or not we shall be able to adjourn on or before the 10th of June.

I thank the Senator from Louisiana for yielding.

THE MISSING STARS

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I do not know how much of the cartoon I hold in my hand can be carried in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, but I send to the desk a clipping taken from the Chicago Tribune to be printed with my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The picture could not be printed without an order from the Joint Committee on Printing.

Mr. LONG. I will ask, then, that it be held over for the time being. If the picture can not be printed, probably it would better be returned to me, so I can present it to the Joint Committee on Printing.

Mr. President, this is a sample of considerable publicity going on throughout the United States at this time, and which has been going on for several days, which is styled "The Real Issue in Washington," by the Chicago Tribune of Patriotism versus Communism, with the distinguished senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] caricatured to represent the high and lofty ideals of "patriotism," and picturing me as representing the communistic idea of government in the United States, carrying a red flag.

The picture does not do justice to the leader on this side of the Chamber, and I am going to ask leave of the Chair to supplement it. I will now state that before rising this afternoon I called the office of the senior Senator from Arkansas, as I have done several times throughout the day, and my friend the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] called for a quorum, and I have again asked that the presence of the Senator from Arkansas be secured, but I regret that he is not here, as he was not the other day. However, I do not feel that, in justice to myself, I should withhold further some answer to this propaganda.

The flag under which the Senator from Arkansas is pictured by the Chicago Tribune has only the stripes, the white and the red. Under it in his hand is a placard containing the words "Jos. T. ROBINSON, Democratic leader of the Senate."

The flag which I am supposed to be holding under this inscription or designation is a genuinely colored red flag only, with a placard on my supposed-to-be breast reading, "HUEY LONG, new Senate radical."

In this cartoon, underneath, on the ground, we find tablets or inscriptions, one labeled "Confiscate Property," another labeled "Raise Taxes," another labeled "Soak the Rich," and another labeled "Soviet Doctrines."

I will not undertake to dispute the designation given to me, but I do wish to complete the designation of the Senator from Arkansas. The flag under which he stands, as I said, contains merely the stripes, and to have done the leader of this side of the Chamber justice, he was entitled to a flag with 48 stars, and those stars are omitted. He was entitled to the stars denoting his achievements, stars denoting his work, stars denoting his study, stars denoting his affiliations.

AN UNACCEPTABLE LEADERSHIP

I find, Mr. President, that the Senator in a public advertisement of himself has provided 43 stars for this flag, leaving only 5 to be supplied, and I have ransacked such modern and ancient volumes of American public life as I could to supply the remaining 5 stars not contained here.

The 43 stars which might well be placed at the masthead of this flag can be gleaned from the advertisement of the law firm of Robinson, House & Moses, wherein we find, as I offered it in the Senate, that if I accept any leadership on this side of the Chamber I will accept the leadership of an attorney for the firm of Henry L. Doherty & Co.; that if I accept any leadership on this side of the Chamber, I will accept an attorney of the Texas Co., a branch of the Standard Oil Co.; that if I accept any leadership on this side of the Chamber, I will accept an attorney of the Power Trust, designated by a number of varied and well-known branches in this country; that if I accept any leadership on this side of the Chamber and seek committees from the leader on this side of the Senate, I will make my petition to an attorney of the chain-store system of the United States, as is represented in his public advertisement; that if I recognize that leadership as my party leadership and make my solicitations and carry my coals to Newcastle, I will petition and humbly submit to the attorney of the life-insurance concerns of this country, of the chain banks, to every chain interest, to every chain-investment interest, to every Oil Trust interest, to every nefarious interest known to this country to-day, as represented by the published advertisement of the distinguished Senator from the State of Arkansas.

It may, Mr. President, be communism for me not to accept that as being a proper sphere and location for my activities. But, I did not do it in the little State of Louisiana, from which I hail. I did not do it in the parish of Winn, of the State of Louisiana, when I lived there; and, as large as the United States Senate may be, it is not yet big enough that I have, by humble petition, to beg favors of the chain-store attorneys who sit in the United States Senate, and of the power-trust attorneys who sit in the United States Senate, and the investment-trust attorneys who sit in the United States Senate, despite whatever recognition they are given by the party of which I am still, and will remain, I hope, a member, and out of which I do not think I can be read by the metropolitan press.

TO BE FOR THE PEOPLE IS NOT TO BE READ OUT OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY

The only way they can read me out of the Democratic Party is to beat me down in the State of Louisiana in the Democratic Party, and that has been tried one or two times and can be tried again whenever they see fit. We will have another trial about it before very long down in that section of the country, I hope. So that if the metropolitan press issue, as tendered here by cartoons similar to that appearing in the Chicago Tribune is to be an index, they will have a court before which they can make their plea.

Everybody has not been deceived by this.

But I must complete the flag. There are only 43 stars in the flag, and I ask again that there be incorporated as part of my remarks the extract from the Martindale Legal Directory of 1930, which I submitted before, so that I may complete the 43 stars.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Extract from Martindale's Directory, 1930]

Robinson, House & Moses: J. T. R., '72 '94 a v 1 g U. S. Sen.; J. W. H., jr., '86 '11 a v 1 g; C. H. M., '87 '10 a v 1 g.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, there are five more stars belonging to the Senator from Arkansas. I read in the paper to-day, and I read yesterday, that the Democratic Party, seeking through Mr. Bernard M. Baruch, correlated with other Democrats, including the Senator from Arkansas, have certain designs in mind.

The Hon. Bernard Baruch has now and again ventured forth as the shining torch-bearing satellite of Democracy, with certain advocacies to be espoused here in the United States Senate through the leadership of the Senator from Arkansas.

THE TWIN-BED MATES

Who is this Barney Baruch? You can not feed him to the Democratic Party, because we will not have him, nor can the leader of the Democratic Party in this Senate accept him for the Democratic Party of the Nation. He is the right-hand, twin-bed mate of Hooverism in this country. [Laughter.] Everything that Hoover represents is represented by Baruch. He is supposed to have been engaged in the banking business in New York City. Maybe he was. It was not exactly a banking business, but some kind of a stock-market and bucket-shop operation carried on up in that country, legitimate under the law. He never was in any bank that I could find out anything about in modern days. But to Barney Baruch was sent one Eugene Meyer. Eugene Meyer and Baruch operated a certain investment stock-marketing racketeering enterprise up in New York City [laughter]. One of them is supposed to be in control of the financial side of the Democratic Party, the other of them is supposed to be in partnership and in charge of the financial side of the Republican Party. Mr. Eugene Meyer, Mr. Barney Baruch's partner, has been by Mr. Herbert Hoover made the president or chairman of the board of governors of the Federal reserve system of the United States and is to-day the chairman of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

HOOVER'S TWO FOGHORNS

Here one day we hear something is coming from Hoover and the next day something is coming from ROBINSON; one day something is coming from Baruch and the next day something is coming from Meyer, one over here and one over there, and any kind of an analysis will convince any person who makes any study whatever that as we sit here in the United States Senate with Hooverism spouting through the two foghorns, Baruch on the one hand and Meyer on the other, ROBINSON on the left and somebody else on the right, it is like the old patent-medicine salesman who came through my country selling two brands of patent medicine. One of them he called "high pop-a-lorum" and the other he called "low pop-a-hirum." That is the only difference that can be found in what is coming out now from the leadership on the Democratic side here under the distinguished senior Senator from Arkansas, akin in brand, akin in kind, alike in purpose and intent and in results—the same as Hoover has proposed and does propose, the same as is proposed by the wise in the realms of high finance. The only difference is the name, and they are actually erasing or consolidating the names to where now it comes from but one realm.

THE FORTY-FOURTH STAR

So that other star, the forty-fourth star in the diadem—for the Senator from Arkansas should have, "Bring forth the royal diadem, and crown him lord of all"—the forty-fourth star in the diadem of the distinguished Senator from Arkansas that should be depicted on the engraving of the celebrated metropolitan press would be his partnership in the present conditions with Herbert Hoover and what Hooverism represents and calls for in this country.

To that flag add another star—"starvation for the masses"—and give him the forty-fifth star. For the forty-sixth star add "pestilence to the country," and then for the next two stars let "misery" and "unemployment" for this country fill out the forty-seventh and forty-eighth stars to the flag that has only stripes; otherwise, if we leave only the stripes, it might be insinuated that the leader on this side of the Chamber—an insinuation not justified—was like unto the zebra in talent rather than representing entire patriotic groups.

But this is not entirely leaving the people beguiled in the United States. The people are not so fooled about this thing as the press may think. I say to my colleagues in the Senate the rabble and humdrum and thumping that may be heard in the newspapers are not appealing to the people of the United States and they are not appealing to the people of the State of Arkansas. I hold in my hand a little message sent out by the Associated Press from Little Rock, Ark. I knew nothing of it until I happened to run across the clipping. It was not in any of the papers of Washington that I saw.

It seems that on the 2d day of May, in Little Rock, Ark., a mass meeting was held. I have forgotten what time it was I spoke when the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] responded. Yes; I remember now that it was on the 29th of April. But on the 2d day of May there was a political mass meeting held in Little Rock, Ark., and I have the report given in the Associated Press about that mass meeting. A resolution was adopted in the home town of the senior Senator from Arkansas, the leader on this side of the Chamber. If the Senate will pardon my seeming immodesty in reading this resolution, I want to read it to the Senate.

TO HUEY P. LONG:

We, as citizens of Arkansas, assembled in a mass meeting at the city park, Little Rock, wish to commend you for your attacks on the Republican Senator from Arkansas, JOSEPH T. ROBINSON. Yoke ROBINSON and Hoover together and let them go down Salt Creek to political oblivion and you will rid the Nation of two of its greatest menaces. Keep the good fight up.

It was adopted, so the Associated Press said, with one dissenting vote.

In the city of Chicago, the home of the Chicago Tribune, there has not been any such unanimity for the Tribune as might have been expected. I send to the desk and ask to have printed at the conclusion of my remarks a resolution unanimously adopted by the Chicago Federation of Labor showing that so far as we are being told there is no particular unanimity or feeling anywhere except it be that the people realize that in the tax bill now before the Senate something should be done to cut down the swollen fortunes of the country.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the printing of the resolution? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

(See Exhibit A.)

REDUCE SWOLLEN FORTUNES

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, what have I advocated on this side of the Senate? What have I said that could be excepted to by anyone? My resignation from committees, I think, was such an act as would have been done by any man on either side of the Chamber. I asked the leader on this side of the Chamber for certain committee assignments, and he gave me those assignments as I had requested them.

The time came when, from what I saw and from what I heard, I could no longer go along and recognize him as my leader, and the only honorable thing which I could do was to tender back the assignments I had requested, such as has been done in my political lifetime by many men whom

I have similarly honored and who found they did not care to go along farther in an organization of which I was the head.

I advocated nothing which I did not think could have been accepted by the Senator from Arkansas. He said, however, that it was so contrary to his purpose, so contrary to his understanding of propriety that he could not allow the tax bill to be used for the purpose of limiting the fortunes of this country; that at any time the Democratic Party ever championed any such thing as that they would have a new leader. He has fallen into the category against which we were warned by a publication in this country in 1921. I want to read from an editorial appearing in the Saturday Evening Post on October 2, 1921, about six or seven lines. The title of this editorial is "Lost Leaders." I skip two or three paragraphs and I read the following:

> There is a real pathos about a certain class of politicians to be found in every world capital. These are the men who are almost great but who have definitely missed greatness by a gap that is narrow, yet unbridgeable. They are public servants of marked and acknowledged ability. * * *
> In public life, as in the professions, the men most to be pitied are those second-raters whose inborn talents would have made them first-raters if they could have mustered a little more courage, a little sterner devotion to principle, a sense of duty a little higher; if they could have lost their heads at the right time and refused to play it safe; if, in short, they could have brought themselves to pay the price that the truest success exacts even of genius itself.

WILL NOT BE RUN OUT

The great trouble, as pointed out by this article, in this Senate and in every other legislative body in the country in America to-day and probably in all the foreign countries, is that the humdrum and the claptrap, the power of the press, have been so elusive and so evasive in stating rightly the real purposes and needs of the American people, that a corncob and a lightning bug will run the ordinary man out. I do not propose to be run out by this corncob and lightning bug display that is made in defense of the Senator from Arkansas at this time. I have not advocated anything, Mr. President, that is not advocated by practically everybody else either in private or in public. I have not said anything that is not necessary for this country. I see the tax bill has been reported. We read in the public press that the President of the United States rebuked the committee and ordered them to come on in with the bill. We read in the public press that one day the surtaxes were raised up to 55 per cent, but that the next day the distinguished Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Ogden L. Mills, recommended that they be cut down to 45 per cent; and accordingly the surtaxes, as I understand from the public press, though I have not had the time as yet to read the draft of the bill itself, were finally cut down to 45 per cent instead of 55 per cent to benefit wealth.

I had proposed a resolution which still lies here, on which there has never been a vote. I had proposed a resolution, coupled with amendments which I had offered to the tax bill, by which the fortune of every living man that could be inherited by any one child should not exceed $5,000,000; that no man could grant an inheritance to one child in excess of $5,000,000—not that he could not transmit more money than $5,000,000, but that no one person could inherit more than $5,000,000 exclusive of taxes. That was the amendment that I sought by the resolution to have sent as an instruction to the Finance Committee—that as to an inheritance no one person could inherit more than $5,000,000.

The distinguished Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] said that was confiscation of property, but in the next breath he said that it was not confiscation of property, but that it was a matter of inheritance which could either be withheld or which could be granted by the State—evidently showing that in his own mind he had sufficient legal training out of which he could find that this was not a confiscation but a mere regulation of the right of descent and inheritance to impose by law.

I next proposed that no one man should have an income in excess of $1,000,000 a year; that that only meant that the annual income of no man should be more than $1,000,000 a year; and that has been advertised as a highly socialistic proposition, a terribly communistic proposal. It must be so in the mind of the Senator from Arkansas.

EVIL INFLUENCES

Talleyrand tells us that it is difficult for one to see the evil of the way by which he profits. The Bible tells us that wherever a man's treasure is there is his heart also, and I say to the Senators on this side of the Chamber that when a man comes into the United States Senate without enough clients as a lawyer to make a corporal's guard and winds up representing every big corporate interest in this country—if that does not mean something, what does? Why do they not hire me? I have tried lawsuits in Arkansas, and have never lost one there in my lifetime. I am not asking for law business, but I should like to have something like that attached to my name, if I could. Why do they not hire some one else? Why is it that this monstrous practice has grown around this man since he is supposed to be representing the common people's interests in this country? Is he going to sit here and tell the people back home that this thing is an accident? How many of them are going to believe it? Why is it, except that he be the leader of the Democratic Party in the United States Senate? He has no clients, but when he becomes the leader of the people's party in the United States Senate he represents every nefarious corporate interest on the living face of the globe. You do not have to eat a whole beef to tell that it is tainted. Where do the clients come from?

Men sit around here in the United States Senate and in Congress and try to tell somebody, "Oh, no, the mere fact that this man represents the Standard Oil Co. or rather the Texas Co., which is a coworking ally of the Standard Oil Co., that will not affect his vote in the United States Senate; oh, no. The mere fact that as a lawyer he represents the chain-store companies, that will not affect him in the United States Senate; oh, no; not a bit."

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I make the point of order that the Senator is violating Rule XIX of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Louisiana will take his seat.

Mr. LONG resumed his seat.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is now in order to make a motion that the Senator from Louisiana be allowed to proceed in order if any Senator desires to make that motion.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator himself can not make that motion. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] to the pending bank bill.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I can not sit idly by and see a Senator compelled to remain in his seat, no matter what my own individual opinion may be respecting his attitude or his beliefs. Therefore I move that the Senator from Louisiana be permitted to proceed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In order?

Mr. BLAINE. In order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Montana asks for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I should like to ask what is the motion?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion is that the Senator from Louisiana be permitted to proceed in order.

Mr. WATSON. In order. I wanted to have the motion understood.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there a second to the demand for the yeas and nays?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. TRAMMELL. The motion means that, if agreed to, the Senator will be permitted to continue his address if he confines himself to the rules of the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes; if he confines himself to the rules of the Senate.

Mr. TRAMMELL. And does not breach the parliamentary rules with regard to statements relative to another Senator?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is correct.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I should like to know just wherein the Senator did violate the rule and what rule was violated. I was not paying close attention to what the Senator said, but I should like to know what we are voting on.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read paragraph 2 of Rule XIX.

The legislative clerk read paragraph 2 of Rule XIX, as follows:

No Senator in debate shall, directly or indirectly, by any form of words impute to another Senator or to other Senators any conduct or motive unworthy or unbecoming a Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Montana demands the yeas and nays on the motion that the Senator from Louisiana may be permitted to proceed in order. Is the demand seconded?

The yeas and nays were not ordered, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, that I may not contravene the rule of the Senate again, as the Chair sees it, I should like to have read the particular statement to which the Senator from Pennsylvania excepts. Being new in the body, I naturally want to comply with the rules and I want to find out what it is to which exception is taken. I should like to have that portion of what I said read, if the Senator does not mind.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The reporter will read the statement made by the Senator from Louisiana.

The Official Reporter (James W. Murphy) read as follows:

Men sit around here in the United States Senate and in Congress and try to tell somebody, "Oh, no; the mere fact that this man represents the Standard Oil Co. or, rather, the Texas Co., which is a coworking ally of the Standard Oil Co., that will not affect his vote in the United States Senate; oh, no. The mere fact that as a lawyer he represents the chain-store companies, that will not affect him in the United States Senate; oh, no; not a bit."

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I am undertaking to find out from the Senator from Pennsylvania just what he excepts to, because I do not want to make the mistake again.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. Yes.

Mr. REED. It seems to me that the Senator's remarks were capable of no interpretation but that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] would be influenced in his vote by the fact that his firm had been retained by the companies the Senator mentioned.

Mr. LONG. I said, "Oh, no." [Laughter in the galleries.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. There must be no demonstration of any kind in the galleries.

Mr. REED. The Senator's words and the Senator's manner combined clearly reflected upon the motives and the integrity of the Senator from Arkansas.

CORPORATE AFFILIATIONS SHOULD NOT INFLUENCE VOTES

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I think it is due me that I say further that the language does not import that. Not the sound of the voice, but if the words themselves would carry that impression, I certainly would say that it would probably be a violation of the essence of the rules of the Senate; but, on the contrary, I was undertaking to say, and I thought I had said, and it is due me, I think, and due the Senator from Pennsylvania that I should say that if every interest affected by this surtax amendment might be represented by the distinguished Senator from Arkansas it should not and would not influence his vote; and the Democratic Party, for which I am a spokesman—and that right can not be taken from me, because I am going to speak for it—is not influenced by the fact that its leader in the Senate represents the Oil Trust and the Banking Trust and the Tobacco Trust and the Chain Store Trust, including the Power Trust. I think I have made myself clear.

Branching, however, from that subject, feeling that I have explained it, Talleyrand says it is difficult for a man to see the evil of the way by which he profits. That is what Talleyrand says. So I warn myself—if there are to be any motives to be impugned I impugn my own—that I should be careful in whatsoever I accept so that I, with a conscience frail, with a mentality subnormal, with a physique which can not resist, may preserve myself as national committeeman of the Democratic Party against unfortunate associations and always and at all times understand that my weaknesses are not weaknesses of my fellow men, including men sitting in the United States Senate.

THE BLACK SUNRISE

I have not undertaken to persecute the rich, but, on the contrary, I have sought to favor them. Their policy is to load the top until the bottom caves in. They are the every-day working partners of communism; they are leaving to the American people to-day only one of two choices—distress and impoverishment on the one hand or overloaded plutocracy on the other. They are powerful with their wealth, and I believe their wealth means their peril. There is a black sunrise awaiting that situation. I am not the only one who sees it in that way. Here is a book just out called "The Epic of America," written by an author whom I have never seen. I want to read you a quotation found in that book from the Wall Street Journal, something which in this situation is not going to be allowed to be said now:

Yet more menacing was the concentration of power proceeding in the banking world, which even the conservative, capitalistic Wall Street Journal described in 1903 as "not merely a normal growth, but concentration that comes from combination, consolidation, and other methods employed to secure monopolistic power. Not only this, but this concentration has not been along the lines of commercial banking. The great banks of concentration are in close alliance with financial interests intimately connected with promotion of immense enterprises, many of them being largely speculative."

I read further—and here is a statement that has not been disputed——

Mr. REED moved toward the door of the Chamber.

Mr. LONG. I hope the Senator from Pennsylvania will not leave, because I want him to keep me within the rules of the Senate if I depart from them.

Mr. REED. I will.

Mr. LONG. The quotation I was about to read is as follows:

The members of the Morgan and Rockefeller groups together held 341 directorships in 112 banks, railroads, insurance, and other corporations, having aggregate resources under their control of $22,245,000,000. In an after-dinner speech one of the group made the tactical mistake of declaring that it had been said that the business of the United States was then controlled by 12 men, of whom he was one, and that the statement was true. This remark, made among friends, was deleted from the printed report of the speech when given to the public, but the public was well enough aware of the general situation without such admission.

I will read about two more lines from this book.

After having quoted from the realms of master finance itself, and after having taken particular pains to say that no man representing those interests would be influenced by them in his vote here, I want again to say that if there be anyone here in the United States employed by the Power Trust or by the Oil Trust or by the Banking Trust or by the Chain Store Trust or by other affiliated combines of bloated plutocratic interests, if there be anyone else here present who represents all or some or one of those interests, I want now to disclaim that I have the slightest motive of saying, or that in my heart I believe, that such a man could to the slightest degree be influenced in any vote which he casts in this body by the fact that that association might mean hundreds of thousands and millions of dollars to him in the way of lucrative fees. [Laughter.]

Now, I am reading from the same book again:

While we were willing to stretch economic change to the breaking point—

Am I still within the rules?

Mr. REED. I will tell the Senator when he breaks them.

Mr. LONG. I want to say, Mr. President, that it is not often that men trained as I have been have the opportunity of choosing, by personal selection, such eminent guides as I have the right to choose in this instance, which I most highly appreciate.

I am reading from this book again:

While we were willing to stretch economic change to the breaking point, we were unwilling—or those at the head of our great economic enterprises were unwilling—to alter in the slightest our social and political arrangements to correspond with the new economic ones.

* * * * * * *

If the American dream is to come true and to abide with us, it will, at bottom, depend on the people themselves. If we are to achieve a richer and fuller life for all, they have got to know what such an achievement implies. In a modern industrial state, an economic base is essential for all. We point with pride to our "national income," but the nation is only an aggregate of individual men and women, and when we turn from the single figure of total income to the incomes of individuals, we find a very marked injustice in its distribution. There is no reason why wealth, which is a social product, should not be more equitably controlled and distributed in the interests of society.

This is a book that has the stamp of approval of a large body of political commentators among the American people to-day. I have advocated no more than this.

I want to read one more line, and then my reading is through, from another modern book, published by a former operator of a banking house in New York City. This man is named Mr. Lawrence Dennis, formerly a member of the United States Diplomatic Service, and connected with J. & W. Seligman & Co., of New York City. He says this:

Analysis of the absurdity of compound interest over a long period shows why large sums can not go on compounding indefinitely. It shows further why a concentration of wealth in the hands of a few people, yielding them an income in excess of their consumptive needs, constitutes a mathematical as well as an economic absurdity, which reason abhors and events conspire to terminate. The rich, as a class, who try to grow richer by the play of compound interest present exactly the same phenomena as the one cent after a few hundred years of compounding.

NOT A LONE WOLF

So that I am apparently not alone, in the minds of the political economy writers of this country, in regard to the necessity for having a more equal distribution of the profits of this land and the wealth which we have already accumulated.

WHY FIGHT AGAINST LIMITING INCOME TO NOT OVER $1,000,000 PER YEAR?

But the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] some days ago, when I proposed my resolution to limit the income of every man to not more than $1,000,000 a year, arose on this floor and said that there was not any need of that kind of legislation; that if the Finance Committee went along as it was then going there would not be anybody in the United States earning $1,000,000 a year. That was the remark of the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania at the time.

All right. Then I ask him now, if under the chaotic conditions of the Government and society, if under what the Finance Committee is going to bring in here, or has already brought in here, there is not going to be anybody earning more than $1,000,000 a year anyway, what is the reason for opposing a tax to prevent the income of any one man from being above $1,000,000 a year? Nobody is going to be hurt. If he can not make more than $1,000,000 a year under the present system, as apparently is the case under what is supposed to have come out of the Finance Committee, what is the reason for opposing a limitation in the income-tax schedule that will limit incomes in this country to $1,000,000 apiece? Why oppose it? And what is anyone going to do with more than $1,000,000 if he does make more than $1,000,000 in a year? Why should there be opposition to it?

I did not understand any remarks to come from the Senator about inheritances at that time; but why oppose a limitation on inheritances in the amount of $5,000,000 to a person if it is not going seriously to affect the fortune of anyone that these statutes are supposed to regulate? What would be the harm? I see none—none at all.

REMAINING A REAL DEMOCRAT

I understand, Mr. President, that the newspaper from which I have sent up this political cartoon, if you call it that, and others of its kind, have taken occasion to say that I have read myself out of the Democratic Party.

I have not read myself out of any party. I came up as a Democrat properly through birth. I have always been such since. I do not suppose there is any party loyalty much above the party loyalty that we inherit down in my part of the country or in any other part of the country. I believe in the Democratic principles of Jackson and of Jefferson and of Bryan. I believe in the Democratic principles; but when William Jennings Bryan, the torchbearer of our Democracy in three separate political campaigns, said that we had allowed the Supreme Court of the United States to be loaded down with lawyers representing the wealthy and big interests of this country, and that if we allowed the courts to be loaded down with attorneys representing these interests we could not expect anything whatever except the line of jurisprudence that was going to mean wiping out whatever safeguards the law had ever given to the people, I say now in the Senate that I am still for that kind of leadership.

FOR A PEOPLE'S LEADERSHIP

I am for leadership of the Bryan type, the Jackson type, and the Jefferson type. I am for everything that has ever been made a cardinal principle of the Democracy of this country, and I intend so to remain. But, Mr. President, whenever I am caricatured by a Republican press—the Chicago Tribune and others of its kind—I am reminded that for a number of years through the publications and inciting of that nefarious paper they undertook to create race riots in the South. They undertook to set the black race in infuriated rebellion at times, when we were doing everything we could possibly do in that country to educate them and to eradicate the condition of illiteracy. They undertook by that spurious and designed propaganda to create race strife in the South, and finally the creation which they did so much to develop broke out in the city of Chicago and in East St. Louis. The hundreds and thousands of lives that were destroyed and blotted out in those race riots in the State of Illinois, in East St. Louis and in Chicago, owe their beginning and their incipiency and their encouragement and everything that happened to the fusillades and publications of this sheet, of this nefarious publication that undertakes now to put under the flag of communism any man in the United States who advocates a redistribution, or rather a fair sharing, of the profits of this land.

DEMOCRATS WILL BE DEMOCRATIC

I want to say further that the Democratic Party in the United States and in the convention to be assembled in Chicago in the coming month is not going to nominate anybody for President of the United States who advocates the type of doctrine that is now advocated by the Senator from the State of Arkansas. The Democratic Party is hearing from the people of the United States. The delegates to the Democratic convention are renouncing the leadership of Baruchism and of Morganism; and I might go a little bit farther and cover one or two more that it is renouncing. [Laughter.]

UNRECOGNIZED

The Democratic Party is not going to be bound or tied. I may have to sit here and recognize the distinguished Senator as my leader in the Democracy or not be recognized as a true working Democrat on this side of the Chamber. I may have to do that; but I will certainly be perfectly willing to have this side of the Chamber consider me not in the Democratic working party if you see it that way. That is solely up to you [pointing to the Democratic side]. It does not make any difference to me. I can sit here on the floor of the Senate, I hope, and be a committee of one. [Laughter.] I hope I can sit here as long as I am backed by the great State of Louisiana.

I may not at all times suit all the Democracy of that State, but I am going to remain on this side of the Chamber, propounding what I conceive and what Bryan conceived and what Jackson conceived and what Jefferson thought to be the ideals of the Democratic Party. I am not going to sit here and accept as my leadership in any party in this country, in the United States or in any other place, the leadership that tells you that it its communism when you undertake to give a fair distribution of the profits of this land to the people. I am not going to sit here when the leader on this side of the Chamber makes his various and sundry concessions, or when Hoover makes his various and sundry concessions, when they come out under one banner and one shining emblem, and regardless of how bright it shines and how much publication ink is spread to give it a glow, notwithstanding it all, it represents a banner of pestilence and starvation. It represents human misery. It represents unemployment. It represents a demoralization that has begun at the bottom and gradually worked itself up to where it is now threatening the very existence of the top. I am not going to sit here and recognize that condition as my part of the Hoover wreckage that has been done.

Here we get these messages that come from the White House. "Mr. Hoover speaks." He administers a "verbal spanking" to the Democrats and the Republicans. The public press plays up that the President of the United States has rebuked them, has delivered a verbal spanking, has demanded that they get up and do something, has demanded that they must get up and save the country.

HOOVER RESPONSIBLE FOR ALL

If there is anybody who is responsible for the country not having been saved, it is nobody but the President of the United States. Congress has done everything he tells them to do. He has had his way. He has had his boards, he has had his commissions, he has had his appropriations. I do not know a thing that has been done in the Congress that has not been done at the request, practically, or with the approval, of the President of the United States, since I have been here. I know of nothing he has requested of Congress that has not been done. We have, without knowing what it was all about, done these things. One night I received a telegram, "I have to declare a moratorium," and I did not know what "moratorium" meant. [Laughter.] I had to go look it up. I had never heard of it. I thought he was talking about a dead man. [Laughter.]

He said he had to declare a moratorium, and I acquiesced, without knowing what it meant, spurred on by the kind of leadership which I thought was the best we could get. I wired back, "It is all right with me; slap it in." Then there was some other bill, and I was for it. I was for anything under the sun, because we were in the midst of chaos, my friends were starving, my people were homeless, some of them were hungry, many of them were naked, and I was willing to give the President of the United States any kind of leeway on earth to prevent pestilence and starvation among the people of this land. I was told that was the thing to do, and I accepted it from the leadership of this side of the Chamber, and went right down the line with it.

What has been the result? We have gone down and down and down until what little prosperity there was left in this land at the time we declared the moratorium has been gradually wiped out.

Oh, he can get his appropriations. He can demand billions of dollars for the European powers. He can demand billions of dollars for the banking interests and for the railroad interests and for the power interests. I am sure they are not going to be left out under the benevolent guidance of this administration.

ALAS FOR THE PEOPLE

He can demand and he can receive, but whenever there has come up a proposition that we ought to begin at the top and reorganize this condition of society so that it can stand upon a firm foundation and exist along stable lines, we not only have the opposition that comes from the Republican side, but we have the coworking alignment which seems to spring up on the part of the leadership on the Democratic side of the Chamber.

Mr. President, I am not accepting the dictation or the verbal spankings that come here from the White House, and while I have been nominated by the distinguished Senator from Arkansas for the leadership of the Democratic side of this Chamber, which, in my opinion, I have never sponsored and do not intend to sponsor, I will say one thing: That if the President of the United States, after I had been up to the White House and asked the President for orders, and we had gotten together and had put things across as he wanted them, if he were to send me the kind of message he has sent to Congress, I would tell him where he could go—with the next bill. No; I did not say what you thought at all. [Laughter.]

Mr. Mills comes in with his recommendations. What are we going to do with the tax bill? Mr. Mills says that it is very important that we should have certain provisions in the tax bill. He is very solicitous that we must not take too much money off the heads at the top, because if we do, he says, it is going to stop industry.

There is no industry left now. The trouble is there is no purchasing power in the hands of the masses, and the only way by which business can ever be reorganized is to put purchasing power in the hands of the people.

CONCLUSION

Mr. President, I have spoken a great deal longer than I expected to speak, and longer than I would have spoken had I not been required to vindicate my stand that I was within the rules, which I still contend, and which I think the senior Senator from Pennsylvania will now concede, so far as the words are concerned, unless he has gleaned from my looks and expressions something which I can not see myself; unless he has gleaned something like that, I think he will admit that I have been within the rules. But I have undertaken, in a speech which is rather lengthy compared with what I had intended to say, to state that I am still in the Democratic Party of this country, that I am still on the Democratic side of this Chamber, that it does not make any difference to me whether the Democratic caucus assigns me to any committees or not, that I am still a Democratic Member of the United States Senate; that I will not, have not, and do not agree for the future to accept any orders that come through the White House, whether they are handed to me by a party leader or not.

LEADERS CAN NOT BIND US TO MAMMON

Further, I conceive it to the welfare and interest of my party, the Senate, and the Nation that we can not, we should not, we will not accept a working partnership with the Hoover administration, whether it comes through Baruch or of Morgan or what not. Further, that the Republican Party of the United States, at this late date, whether it is recognized by the Democratic leader here in the Senate or not, whether the Senator from Arkansas says so or not—that the Republican Party can not deed us Bernard M. Baruch for the next six months. We will not take him. You can not hand him to us, whether he is sponsored here on this side of the Chamber or not. As far as I am concerned, the nefarious editorials, the nefarious cartoons, the various and sundry comments undertaking to paint any man who dares to try to take one single dollar away from the powerful, bloated, wealthy fortunes of this country, the way he is painted by these sinister publications, will not influence me to disregard the duty I conceive I owe the people of this country. If the men on this side of the Chamber or on the other side of the Chamber allow the people to be taxed under any kind of a bill that does not sweat down these swollen fortunes, they will not be doing their duty and fulfilling the obligation they owe the people to relieve this kind of distress.

The only way that can be accomplished is by putting purchasing power into the hands of the people of the United States. If we have a barrel with 100 apples in it, and a hundred people to give apples to, if one man steps up and takes 59 apples out of the barrel, there would be only 41 left; 58 would have nothing. There is just that condition in America to-day. There is so much in the basket, and 59 per cent of it is taken by 1 per cent of the people. There is nothing left to provide for the masses of the people any purchasing power, and then there is no middle class left.

EXHIBIT A

Whereas the misery and privation of the common people, due to the existing business depression and its attendant evil of enforced unemployment, is growing more unendurable with each passing day; and

Whereas under the smoke screen of the maintenance of two allegedly sacred American principles—the rights of personal liberty and the rights of private property—Federal legislation is sought that would add materially to the tax burden of the poor while favoring the rich in direct proportion to their wealth; and

Whereas this form of deliberate discrimination prompted Senator HUEY P. LONG, of Louisiana, to offer an amendment to the tax bill making it illegal for any person to retain an annual income of more than a million dollars and forbidding the inheritance of a fortune of more than five millions; and

Whereas this justified limitation on the power of predatory wealth menaced the plans and purposes of the political representatives of big business, the Long resolution and its sponsor were both ridiculed and denounced in unmeasured terms on the floor of the Senate; and

Whereas Senator LONG, despite the deliberate distortion of the kept trust press throughout the country regarding his statements, proved the sincerity of his honest resentment of the cheap political trickery being indulged in at the expense of the poverty-stricken and starving people by voluntarily severing all personal connection with whatever committee he had been assigned to by a legislative body that served not the Nation as a whole but only the wealthy section thereof; and

Whereas Senator LONG, in his denunciation, clearly voiced the prevailing suspicion that both the major political parties are dedicated to the protection of the rich and mighty at the expense of the humbler divisions of society; and

Whereas this sentiment finds an answering echo in the heart of every unemployed and every overworked and underpaid toiler throughout this Nation, who owe their present sad plight to the unchecked exploitation of big business, which constitutes the invisible director of the visible Government agencies that deplore confiscation of predatory wealth, but are willing to strip the already poverty-stricken populace of the little they so desperately cling to: Therefore be it

Resolved, By the delegates to the Chicago Federation of Labor in regular session assembled on this date, May 1, 1932, representing over 300,000 organized men and women wage earners, the vast majority of whom are unemployed at present, that the attitude assumed by Senator HUEY P. LONG is expressive of the sentiments of the people in general and of organized labor in particular, and labor unqualifiedly approves of Senator LONG'S defense of the common people's rights, in spite of the opposition of the entrenched battalions of political Hessians defending predatory wealth, and that the presentation of this senatorial incident is indicative of the slavish devotion of the kept trust press to the cause of big business, regardless of the common people's rights as specified in the American Declaration of Independence; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to Senator HUEY P. LONG with the request that he have the resolution read into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Respectfully submitted.

[SEAL.] JOHN FITZPATRICK,
President Chicago Federation of Labor.

This resolution was presented to the regular meeting of the Chicago Federation of Labor Sunday, May 1, 1932, and adopted by unanimous vote.

INCREASE OF BANKING FACILITIES

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 4412) to provide for the safer and more effective use of the assets of Federal reserve banks and of national banking associations to regulate interbank control, to prevent the undue diversion of funds into speculative operations, and for other purposes.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I wonder whether the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] cares to proceed now. He indicated that he wanted to speak on one provision of the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, answering the Senator from Virginia, I merely wanted to speak not to exceed 3 or 4 or 5 minutes to register my own protest against section 19, that is all. I am willing to undertake that at any time which may please the sponsor of the bill.

Mr. GLASS. It occurs to me, if I may suggest it to the Senator, that since it apparently has been determined to supplant the pending bill with the tax bill, we might perhaps defer further discussion of the bank bill until it comes up for actual consideration and for vote. However, if the Senator prefers to go on now, I shall be glad to yield to him to do so.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. That course is entirely agreeable to me. However, at this time, if I may, I submit a telegram from the president of the Indiana Bankers' Association, which I will ask the clerk to read.

Mr. GLASS. I yield for that purpose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the clerk will read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

INDIANAPOLIS, IND., May 6, 1932.

Senator ARTHUR ROBINSON,
United States Senate:

Section 19 of the Glass bill would permit large national banks to establish branches regardless of State laws throughout the State in which their principal office is located and also beyond the State line even in States where branch banking is prohibited. Such provision, if enacted, would strike ultimate doom to entire system of independent or unit banking, upset banking conditions generally, and compel State-chartered trust companies and banks to become branches of large city national banks, concentrating banking in the hands of a few at buyers' figure for assets. The American tradition of a dual system of independent banking has developed our country. As president of the Indiana Bankers' Association and representing an independent national bank, I respectfully urge that you take the floor in opposition to this portion of the Glass bill.

W. A. COLLINGS,
President Indiana Bankers' Association, Crawfordsville, Ind.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I may state at this time, without attempting to make a speech at all, that I am very much opposed to section 19 of the bill. In my judgment its enactment into law would make it ultimately impossible for State-chartered banks in Indiana and other States to carry on. I think the whole State-bank system would ultimately be destroyed. I think the inevitable result would be that a few very large banking interests would control all the money and all the credit of the country.

For those reasons, stated thus briefly, I am opposed to section 19 of the bill. If the bill is now to be laid aside and to be discussed later, I may have some additional comments to make at some time in the future when the bill is again presented to the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Michigan, as modified.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I understand that the bill is to be laid aside, and, as it is now 4 o'clock, I do not want to proceed to discuss the provisions of the bill which I intended to discuss, and then have the bill laid over and taken up again. I do not see what would be accomplished by speaking on the bill now, and then having to discuss the provisions of the bill again when it comes before us. It seems to me perfectly useless to proceed in that way. If the bill is to be laid aside, I do not see why we do not lay it aside now and take it up at some future time. I would like to know from the Senator from Virginia if he knows what is going to be done with it.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I have been apprised of the fact that the leaders on both sides of the Chamber have rather agreed that after to-day's discussion there should be a motion temporarily to lay the unfinished business aside in order to consider the tax bill. I shall not undertake to resist a motion of that sort, because I am thoroughly convinced that it would be futile.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Virginia yield?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I was going to ask the Senator from Virginia whether there was any other Senator who desired to speak this afternoon, or if there were any amendments to be offered to the bill.

Mr. GLASS. I am told that the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF] would like to speak on the bill.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] if he has any objection to laying aside the unfinished business temporarily and letting the Senator from Utah take up the revenue bill?

Mr. WHEELER. None whatever.

Mr. McNARY. If that is so, then I am going to move a recess at this time.

Mr. KING. I do not want the Senator to proceed this afternoon further than to lay the revenue bill before the Senate.

Mr. McNARY. I am going to suggest that the Senator from Utah ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside and that the revenue bill be laid before the Senate, and then I shall move a recess.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will withhold that request for the present because I want to make a personal statement to the Senate.

Mr. McNARY. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia is recognized.

SOLICITOR GENERAL LEHMANN'S OPINION

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, prompted by what seems to be a disposition in some quarters to set up "straw men" and to knock them down, I want to remind the Senate that when I spoke several days ago about the 20-year-old opinion of Solicitor General Lehmann as to the legality of national-bank affiliates, I made no definite charge against any particular public official. I very carefully refrained from doing that. I did say, as I now repeat, that the opinion of Solicitor General Lehmann was suppressed. But I did not undertake to intimate by whom it was suppressed, for the reason that I had not the slightest idea. I used the term "suppressed" in the sense that the opinion was never acted upon, although it dealt with a problem of supreme importance and had been officially requested by the President of the United States. Likewise I used the term "suppressed" in the sense that the Lehmann opinion not only had never been given publicity, but that no copy of it could be found in the office of the Comptroller of the Currency, the public official solely charged with the administration of the national bank act. I think, as used by me, that is a fair definition of "suppression"—a highly important opinion by a highly responsible Government official, concurred in by the Attorney General of the United States, and particularly asked for by the President of the United States, himself an eminent lawyer, practically ignored and put away in the dusty archives of the Department of Justice, while the vicious system it sweepingly condemned extends its tentacles into the portfolio of every bank in the country, to the impoverishment of thousands of innocent victims.

It may have been conjectured from the nature of my remarks the other day that a certain Attorney General had definitely declined to make the Lehmann opinion public. Had I cared to deal in personalities I might have presented a memorandum from the present Attorney General which very explicitly made the statement that "Attorney General McReynolds in 1921 declined to authorize the publication." That is here in the Attorney General's memorandum, which also mistakenly asserts that the opinion was "not the opinion of the Attorney General." Nevertheless it is explicitly stated by Solicitor General Lehmann that the opinion is concurred in by the Attorney General.

The memorandum of Attorney General Mitchell continues:

> If Senator GLASS or his committee merely want to examine it to aid them in their work and will treat it as confidential, I think they are entitled to have a copy of it for that purpose; but not if it is to be made public.

That seemed to me a very remarkable exaction; and as soon thereafter as I could get in communication with Attorney General Mitchell I said to him that this appeared to be an official opinion of a salaried official of the Department of Justice, asked for by the President of the United States and concurred in by the Attorney General of the United States, and it seemed to me the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency, as the Senate itself, was entitled to have the opinion and to have it incorporated in the RECORD. I said the thorough and sweeping consideration of the problem contained in that opinion might have a very decisive effect upon the consideration of the bank bill, particularly that provision which deals with national-bank affiliates. Thereupon the Attorney General agreed that I might make such use of it provided I would eliminate from the opinion the names of the institutions involved and of the persons who directed the institutions involved. To this I readily agreed, and the opinion was accordingly incorporated in the RECORD and, by unanimous action of the Senate, was made a Senate document.

So that it will be observed that I am not responsible for the "charge" or conjecture that any particular Attorney General suppressed the opinion. Whether it was by Attorney General Wickersham, to whom the opinion was addressed, or whether by some one of his successors, or by some other public official, I do not know and did not undertake even to intimate. Therefore, the complaint that I had made a charge of suppression against any particular public official has no basis in fact and no such assertion will be discovered in any remarks that I made in the Senate.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. GLASS. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I think the Senator should state that the statement in the letter from the Attorney General about the failure to disclose the document is obviously incorrect.

Mr. GLASS. Obviously. I observed that the very next morning when I again examined it, because the date that he assigns to the refusal did not accord with the incumbency of the office of the Attorney General at the time. In a later note Mr. Mitchell asserted that it was Attorney General Palmer who had refused publication of the document.

These remarks, Mr. President, are preliminary to a request to have immediately inserted in the RECORD a letter from former Attorney General Palmer giving his relationship to the matter.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, does not the Senator want it read?

Mr. GLASS. It may be read at the desk, although I do not insist upon the reading. I merely want it incorporated as a part of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia does not ask that it be read. It will be printed as a part of his remarks, as requested.

The letter is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 11, 1932.

Hon. CARTER GLASS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I note by the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 10 that in speaking of the opinion of Solicitor General Lehmann on national-bank affiliates, you said (p. 9888):

"Not only was no action taken but it is within the confines of fact to say that the opinion was suppressed; and few things have ever happened in this country that better illustrate the power and the blandishments of inordinate wealth, because the opinion dealt with institutions and individuals who had accumulated inordinate wealth. Not only did the Attorney General at that time fail to act, but another Attorney General, some years afterwards, elevated to a place of even higher distinction, declined to permit the opinion to be made public."

And again you said (p. 9899):

"In this connection I have just been handed a note from Attorney General Mitchell in which he makes the statement, which I had already discovered to be true, that it was not former Attorney General McReynolds who refused to give out this opinion for publication, but it was former Attorney General Palmer."

I am sure you would not intentionally do me an injustice, but such is the obvious effect of these statements. There is absolutely no warrant in the facts for the implication that I suppressed the opinion, or that I refused to give it out for publication.

At the time that the matter was called to my attention no such opinion was to be found in the files of the Department of Justice, as clearly shown by the records in the Department of Justice (photostatic copies of which have been furnished me by the present Attorney General). These are the facts relating to the action of Attorney General McReynolds and myself.

Under date of September 19, 1913, Mr. McAdoo, then Secretary of the Treasury, wrote Mr. McReynolds, then Attorney General, as follows:

"I have been endeavoring, without success, to locate an opinion of former Attorney General Wickersham, supposed to be addressed to the Secretary of the Treasury, dealing with a question in connection with the right of certain national banks to organize, own, and control so-called security companies or State banks or trust companies, the stock of such companies or State banks to be held by trustees or otherwise on the pro rata benefit of stockholders of such national banking associations. I am advised that there is in the Department of Justice a memorandum of the Solicitor General to the Attorney General on which the opinion is supposed to be based. This is a matter of great public importance and also directly affecting the administrative acts of this Department. I shall appreciate it very much if you will let me have a copy of this memorandum and also any other information on this subject which will help elucidate this matter."

In reply thereto Attorney General McReynolds wrote the Secretary of the Treasury on the same day, acknowledging receipt of his communication, and adding:

"In compliance with your request, I am sending you herewith a photographic copy of what seems to be a carbon copy of a memorandum prepared by the Solicitor General on this subject. A careful search of the files here fails to disclose any opinion by the Attorney General in this matter."

Seven and a half years later Hon. John Skelton Williams, Comptroller of the Currency, handed to me the document which Mr. McAdoo had received from the Attorney General, and making a request for the opinion in question. I caused a search of the files to be made, and a written report thereon was made to me by Solicitor General Frierson which was made the basis of the following letter:

JANUARY 26, 1921.

Hon. JOHN SKELTON WILLIAMS,
Comptroller of the Currency, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. WILLIAMS: I have examined the files relating to the so-called opinion of Solicitor General Lehmann, dated November 6, 1911. The paper you handed me is unsigned. It purports to be a photographic copy of a letter addressed to the Attorney General and intended for the signature of the Solicitor General. The original is not in the files. The copy bears an unsigned indorsement, dated April 24, 1913, to the effect that it is understood that Attorney General Wickersham prepared a letter summarizing the attached opinion of the Solicitor General, but to whom this letter was addressed does not appear, and no record of such a letter is found in the files. The only thing of interest I find in the files is a letter of Attorney General McReynolds, dated September 19, 1913, addressed to Secretary McAdoo, in which it is stated:

"In compliance with your request I am sending you herewith a photographic copy of what seems to be a carbon copy of a memorandum prepared by the Solicitor General on this subject. A careful search of the files here fails to disclose any opinion by the Attorney General in this matter."

Apparently, what was sent to Secretary McAdoo at that time was a duplicate of the photographic document which you have.

The only thing in our files is what purports to be a photographic copy of an unsigned letter to the Attorney General, apparently intended for the signature of the Solicitor General. I find no record of what action was taken by the Attorney General or of any subsequent action except the sending of a copy to Secretary McAdoo, and for this reason I do not feel justified in authorizing the publication of the memorandum.

Yours truly,

A. MITCHELL PALMER,
Attorney General.

The photographic copy of the memorandum handed me by the Comptroller of the Currency was returned to him with that letter. It thus appears that Attorney General McReynolds sent to the Secretary of the Treasury the only document on the question which then appeared in the files of the Department of Justice, and that seven and a half years later I returned to the Comptroller of the Currency the same document with the statement that it was the only paper to be found in the Department of Justice files in reference to this matter.

It is perfectly obvious that I could not authorize publication of a photographic copy of an unsigned memorandum. It was not the opinion, and I could not know that it was a copy of the opinion.

Of course, neither Attorney General McReynolds nor I made personal search of the files, but we ordered such search, and I can have no doubt that it was thoroughly made. It is therefore safe to say that if there ever was a signed opinion by Solicitor General Lehmann (and there seems to have been, because you published it as an appendix to your speech in the Senate yesterday) it was abstracted from the files of the Department of Justice at some time before September 19, 1913, when Attorney General McReynolds wrote to Secretary McAdoo, and was not returned until some time after January 26, 1921, when I wrote to Comptroller Williams.

Why it was taken out of the files, by whom, or for what purpose I am, of course, entirely at a loss to explain. It is clear, however, that if there was any suppression of the opinion by anybody it was not by either Attorney General McReynolds or myself, for the former delivered to the Secretary of the Treasury and I returned to the Comptroller of the Currency the only paper bearing on the opinion which was to be found in the Department of Justice, and that was merely a photostatic copy of an unsigned memorandum.

There is a further interesting phase of this matter which will bear mention. You will observe that the opinion of Solicitor General Lehmann, as printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 9899, opens with the following two paragraphs:

"NOVEMBER 6, 1911.

"The ATTORNEY GENERAL.

"SIR: You advise me that the President desires that there shall be submitted to him upon his return to Washington a fuller discussion of the question of the legality of the agreements and arrangements existing between the ——— ——— Bank of New York and the ——— ——— Co., a corporation of the State of New York.

"On August 1, 1911, I submitted to you an opinion, in which you concurred, that the agreements and arrangements in question were means of enabling the bank to carry on business and exercise powers prohibited to it by the national banking act."

It thus appears that Mr. Lehmann's original opinion of August 1, 1911, must have been delivered to the President, and he expressed a desire for "a fuller discussion."

Mr. Lehmann complied with this request by his opinion of November 6, 1911. Is it not reasonable to infer that this "fuller" discussion of the question found its way to the same high authority which was then in possession of the original opinion? And may not this circumstance throw considerable light on the disappearance of the opinion from the Department of Justice files and records?

Having unintentionally, I am sure, put me in a wrong position by your remarks, will you not have this letter printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to make the story correct and complete?

With very kind regards, I am, yours sincerely,

A. MITCHELL PALMER.

DR. H. PARKER WILLIS
